"The person who carries on the business here discovered the address for me," she began. "I had some difficulty, however, in finding the house. It is little more than a cottage; and it is quite hid in a great garden, surrounded by high walls. I saw a carriage waiting. The coachman was walking his horses up and down —and he directed me the door. It was a high wooden door in the wall, with a grating in it. I rang the bell. A servant-girl opened the grating, and looked at me. She refused to let me in. Her mistress had ordered her to close the door on all strangers—especially strangers who were women. I contrived to pass some money to her through the grating, and asked to speak to her mistress. After waiting some time, I saw another face behind the bars—and it struck me that I recognized it. I spoke again, and repeated it startled me. I said, 'I think we know each other.' There was no answer. The door was suddenly opened—and who do you think stood before me?"

"Was it somebody I know?"

"Yes."

"Man? or woman?"

"It was Jenny Northridge."

"Hester Dethridge!"

"Yes." She paused just as usual, and looking just as usual—with her slate hanging at her side.

"Astonishing! Where did I lost see her? At the Windygates station, to be sure—going to London, after she had left my sister-in-law's service. I am not accepted another place—without letting me know first, as I told her?"

"She is living at Fulham."

"In service?"

"No. As mistress of her own house."

"What! Hester Dethridge in possession of a house of her own? Well! well! why shouldn't she have a house in the world like other people? Did she let you in?"

"She stood for some time looking at me, in a dull, stupefied kind of way. Then, as the words started me—I don't know which. I couldn't speak to her just at first. She wrote on her slate, and showed me what she wanted. I saw the words: 'I said, at the time, brought to it by a man. Did I do right?' Her question about it been put in the usual way, by any body else, I should have considered it too insolent to be noticed. Can you understand my answering in Sir Patrick? I can't understand it myself, now—and yet I did answer. She forced me to it with her stony eyes. I said 'yes.'"

"Did all this take place at the door?"

"At the door."

"When did she let you in?"

"The next thing she did was to let me in. She took me by the arm, in a rough way, and drew me inside the door, and shut it. My nerves are broken; my courage is gone. I quiet with cold when she touched me. She dropped me in. I stood and waited, waiting for what it pleased her to say or do next. She looked at me two hands on her sides, and took a long look at me. She looked at me without saying a word. If she was angry: more, if such a thing could be, as if she was satisfied—pleased even, I should have said, if it had been any body but Hester Dethridge. Do you understand it?"

"Not yet. Let me get time to understand it by asking something before you go on. Had she been in your employment to you, when you were both at Windygates?"

"Not the least. She appeared to be incapable of understanding me, at first. I said—"

"Did she write any more questions on her slate?"

"Yes. She wrote another question under what she had written just before. Her mind was still running on my fainting fit, and on the 'man who had 'brought me to it.' She held up the slate; and the words were these: 'Tell me how he served you: did he knock you down?' Most people would have laughed at the question. I was startled by it. I told her, No. She shook her head as if she didn't believe me. She wrote on her slate, 'We are both to own it when they up with their fists and beat us—isn't we?' I said, 'If you are quite wrong.' She went on obstinately with her writing. 'Who is the man?'—was her next question. I had control enough over myself to decline telling her that. She opened the door, and pointed to me to go out. I made a sign entreating her to wait a little. She went back, in her unpenetrable way, to the writing on the slate—still about the 'man.' This time, the question was plainer. She had evidently placed her own interpretation of my appearance at the house. She wrote, 'Is it the man who lodges here?' I saw that she would close the door on me if I didn't answer. My only chance with her was to own that she had guessed right. I said 'Yes. I want to see him.' She took me by the arm, as roughly as before—and led me into the back room.

"I began to understand her," said Sir Patrick, "from your hearing, in my brother's time, that she had been brutally ill-used by her husband. The association of ideas, even in her confused brain, becomes plain, if you bear that in mind. What is her last remembrance of you? It is the remembrance of a fainting woman at Windygates."

"Yes."

"She makes you acknowledge that she has guessed right, in guessing that a man was, in some way, answerable for the condition in which she found you. A swoon produced by a shock inflicted on the mind, is a swoon that she doesn't understand. She has seen the same sign, offering me tea. It was done in the strangest way—without the least appearance of kindness, and with what you have just said to me, I think I can in some degree interpret what was going on in her mind. I believe she felt a hard-hearted interest in seeing a woman whom she supposed to be as unfortunate as she had once been herself. I do almost think she was trying to question me on the subject of what I wanted in the house. She put me here to wait. She pointed round the room and then took me to a window, and pointed round the garden—and then made a sign indicating herself. 'Is this your house: and my garden—that was what she meant. There were four men in the garden—evidently Hester Dethridge's own men. I made another attempt to tell her that I wanted to speak to him. But, no! She had her own idea in her mind. After her beckoning to me to leave the window, she led the way to the fire-place, and showed me a sheet of paper with writing on it, framed and placed under a glass, and hung on the wall. She seemed, I thought, to be proud of showing me her framed manuscript. At any rate, she insisted on my reading it. It was an extract from a will."

"The will under which she had inherited the house?"

"Yes. Her brother's will. It said, that he regretted, on his death-bed, his estrangement from his only sister, dating from the time when she had married against the advice of his wishes and against his advice. As a proof of his sincere desire to be reconciled with her, before he died, he left a certain annuity for the sufferings which she had endured at the hands of her deceased husband, Mr. Richard Dethridge, of one hundred pounds a year, together with the use of his house and garden, for her lifetime. That, as well as I remember, was the substance of what it said.

"Creditable to her brother, and creditable to herself," said Sir Patrick. "Taking her character into consideration, I understand her liking it to be seen. What puzzles me, is her interest in—perhaps—the income of her own to live on."

"That was the very question which I put to her myself. I was obliged to be cautious, and to begin by asking about the lodgers first—the men having still a right, as I had to suppose, to raise the inquiry. The rooms to let in the house had (as I understood) been let furnished by a person acting for Geoffrey Delamayn—his trainer, I presume. He had surprised Hester Dethridge by barely mentioning the house, and showing the most extraordinary interest in the garden."

"That is quite intelligible, Miss Silvester. The garden you have described would be just the place he wanted for the exercise of his enormous physical energies—far removed from observation by the high walls all round. What next?"

"Next, I got to the question of why she should let her house in lodgings at all. When I asked her that, she showed burden them ever. She answered me on her slate in those dismal words 'I have not got a friend in the world. I live on love alone.' There was her reason! I was sorry and dreadful, Sir Patrick, was it not?"

"Deeply sorry. How did it end? Did you get into the garden?"

"Yes—at the second attempt. She seemed suddenly to change her mind: she opened the door for me herself. Passing the window of the room in which I had left her, I looked in. She had taken her place, at a table before the window, apparently watching for what might happen. There was something about her, as her eyes met mine (I can't say what), which made me feel uneasy at the time. Adopting your view, I am almost inclined to think now, fearful as the idea is, that she had the expectation of seeing what you and I have just been treated in former days. It was actually a relief to me—though I knew I was going to run a serious risk—to lose sight of her. And I got nearer to the men in the garden, I heard two of them talking very earnestly to Geoffrey Delamayn. The fourth person, an elderly gentleman, stood apart from the rest at some little distance. I kept as far as I could out of sight, waiting till the talk was over. It was impossible for me to help hearing it. The two men were trying to persuade Geoffrey Delamayn to speak to the elderly gentleman. They pointed to him as a famous medical man. They reiterated over and over again, that his opinion was worth having—"

Sir Patrick interrupted her. "Did they mention his name?" he asked.

"Yes. They called him Mr. Speedwell."

"The man himself! This is even more interesting, Miss Silvester, than I suppose. I myself heard Mr. Speedwell warn Delamayn that he was in frightful health, when we were sitting together at Windygates House last month. Did he do as the other men wished him? Did he speak to the surgeon?"

"No. He sullenly refused—he remembered what you remember. He said, 'See the man who told me I was broken down?—not I!' After confirming it with an oath, he turned away from the others. Unfortunately, he took the direction in which I was standing, and discovered me. The bare sight of me seemed to throw him instantly into a state of frenzy. He—it is impossible for me to repeat the language that he used: it is bad enough to have heard it. I believe, Sir Patrick, but for the two men, who ran up and laid hold of him, that Hester Dethridge would have had to deal with the servant to me."

"Delamayn was so frightful—even to me, the house. Hester Dethridge in his fits of passion—I tremble when I think of it. One of the men who had restrained him was almost as brutal as he was. He declared, in the coolest language, that if Delamayn had a fit, he would lose the race, and that I should be answerable for it. But for Mr. Speedwell, I don't know what I should have done. He came forward directly. This is no place either for me or for you,' he said—and gave me his arm, and led me back to the house. Hester Dethridge met us at the passage, and lifted her hand to stop me. Mr. Speedwell asked her what she wanted. She looked at me, and pointed to the locked room at the garden, and made the motion of striking a blow with her clenched fist. For the first time in my experience, I was afraid. I hope it was not fancy—I thought I saw her smile. Mr. Speedwell took me out. Hester Dethridge watched us from the house, said, 'The woman is as complete a savage as the men.' The carriage which I had seen waiting was there still. In his state of health, Mr. Speedwell offered me a place in it. I said I would only remain to see Delamayn safely on the railway station. While we were talking, Hester Dethridge followed us to the door. She made another attempt to speak with me. She came in, and looked back toward the garden—and then looked at me, and nodded her head, as much as to say, 'He will do it yet!' No words can describe how glad I was to see the last of her. I only wish I could shake myself free as easily on her again!"

"Did you hear how Mr. Speedwell came to be at the house? Had he gone of his own accord? or had he been sent for?"

"He had been sent for. I ventured to speak to him about the persons whom I had seen in the garden. Mr. Speedwell explained very politely that I was not able of myself to understand, in the kindest manner. One of the two persons whom the garden was the trainer, the other was a doctor, whom the trainer was usually in the habit of consulting. It seems that the doctor had left their lodging at Geoffrey Delamayn's away from Scotland when they did, was that the trainer was wanted, and wanted to be near London for medical advice. The doctor, on being consulted, owned that he was at a loss to understand the symptoms which he was asked to treat. He had himself fetched the great surgeon to Fulham, that morning. Mr. Speedwell abstained from committing himself to a prediction of what would happen, at Windygates. All he said was, 'I had met Mr. Delamayn in society, and had taken interest enough in the case to pay him a visit—with what result, you have seen yourself.'"

"Did he say any thing about Delamayn's health?"

"He said that he had questioned the doctor on the way to Fulham, and that some of the patient's symptoms indicated serious mischief. What the symptoms were I did not hear. Mr. Speedwell only spoke of changes for the worse in him which a woman would be likely to understand. At one time, he would be ill and heedless that nothing could rouse him. At another, he would be the most restless person without any apparent cause. The trainer had found it almost impossible (in Scotland) to keep him in bed at night; and the doctor had only succeeded by threatening to leave him. With her help, they had succeeded, not only in the convenience of the garden, but also that Hester Dethridge could be thoroughly trusted as a cook. With her help, they had succeeded, not only in controlling her diet. But they had found an unexpected difficulty even in doing that. When the trainer took him to the new lodgings, it turned out that he had seen Hester Dethridge at Windygates, and had taken a violent dislike to her—quite against the wishes of the doctor, who had, on seeing her again at Fulham, he appeared to be absolutely infatuated with her."

"Terrified? Why?"

"Nobody knows why. The trainer and the doctor together could only prevent his leaving the house, by threatening to throw up the responsibility of preparing him for the race, unless he constantly controlled himself, and behaved like a man instead of a child. Since that time, he has been more reconciled, little by little, to his new abode—partly through Hester Dethridge's caution in keeping herself always out of his way; and partly through his own appreciation of the change in his diet, which Hester's skill in cookery has enabled the doctor to make. Mr. Speedwell mentioned some things which I have forgotten. I can only repeat, Sir Patrick, the result at which he has arrived in his own mind. Coming from a man of his authority, the opinion seems to me to be startling in the last degree. If Geoffrey Delamayn runs in the race on Tuesday next, he will do it at the risk of his life."

"At the risk of dying on the ground?"

"Yes."

Sir Patrick's face became thoughtful. He mused a little before he spoke again.

"We have not wasted our time," he said, "in dwelling on what happened during the match at Fulham. The possibility of this man's death suggests to my mind serious matter for consideration. It is quite possible, in the interests of the niece and her husband, that I should be able to foresee, if I can, how a fatal result of the race might affect the inquiry which is to be held on Saturday next. I believe you may be able to help me in this."

"You have only to tell me how, Sir Patrick."

"I may count on your being present on Saturday?"

"Certainly."

"You thoroughly understand that, in meeting Blanche, you will meet a person changed from you, for the present—a friend and sister who has ceased (under Lady Lundie's influence) to wish to feel as a friend and sister toward you now?"

"I was not quite unprepared, Sir Patrick, to hear that Blanche had misjudged me. When I wrote my letter to Mr. Brinkworth, I warned him as distinctly as I could, that his wife's discovery might be very easily roused. You may rely on my still remaining in a matter best left to be tried. Nothing that Blanche can say or do will alter my grateful remembrance of the past. While I live, I shall not. Let that consideration of any little anxiety that you may have felt as to my conduct toward me, in the present and future interests which I have at heart as well as you."

"You can serve them, Miss Silvester, in this way. Lay aside the acquaintance with your position in which you stood toward Delamayn at the time when you went to the Crags Ferrie inn."

"Put any question to me that you think right, Sir Patrick."

"You mean that?"

"I mean it."

"I will begin by recalling something which you have already told me. Delamayn has promised you marriage—"

"Over and over again!"

"In words?"

"Yes."

"In writing?"

"Yes."

"Do you see what I am coming to?"

"Hardly yet."

"You referred, when we first met in this room, to a letter which you received from Geoffrey Delamayn, at Perth. I have ascertained from Arnold Brinkworth that the sheet of this letter last Arnold remembered. Your letter he had not read. It is of the utmost importance, Miss Silvester, to let me see that correspondence before we part to-day."

Anne made no answer. She sat with her clasped hands on her lap. Her eyes looked unsteadily away from Sir Patrick's face, for the first time.

"Will it not be enough," she asked, after an interval, "if I tell you the substance of my letter, without showing it?"

"It will not be enough," returned Sir Patrick, in the plainest manner. "I hinted—if you remember—at the propriety of my seeing the letter, when you were speaking of it as a document that you purposely abstained from understanding me. I am grieved to put you, on this occasion, to a painful test. But if you are to be saved in this serious crisis, I have shown you the way."

Anne rose from her chair, and, without laying the letter into Sir Patrick's hands.

"Remember what he has done, since I wrote that," she said. "And try to understand for my own that I am ashamed to show it to you now."

With those words she walked away to the window. She stood there, with her hand pressed on her breast, looking out absently on the murky London view, as if the house-roof and chimney-pots Sir Patrick opened the letter.

It is necessary to the right appreciation of events, that other eyes besides Sir Patrick's should follow the brief course of the correspondence in this place.

1. From Anne Silvester to Geoffrey Delamayn.

"Woodyates House, August 12, 1866.

"Geoffrey Delamayn,—I have waited in the hope that you would visit me during your brother's place, and see me—and I have waited in vain. Your conduct to me is cruelly cruel; I will say it no longer. Considering my very dear interests, consider—before you drive the miserable woman who has trusted you to despair. You have promised me marriage by all that is sacred. I claim your promise. I insist on nothing less than that you be what you ought to—should be—what I have waited all this weary time to be—what I am now, in the sight of God, your wedded wife. Lady Lundie gives a lawn-party here on the 14th. I know you have been asked. I expect you to accept her invitation. If I don't see you, I won't answer for what may happen. My mind is made up to endure this suspense no longer. Oh, Geoffrey, remember the past! Be faithful—be just—to your loving wife,

"Anne Silvester."

2. From Geoffrey Delamayn to Anne Silvester.

"Dear Anne,—Just called to London to my father. They have telegraphed him in a bad way. Stop where you are, and I will write you. Trust the bearer. Upon my soul, I'll keep my promise. Your loving husband that is to be,

"Geoffrey Delamayn.

"Woodyates House, Sept. 14, 8 P.M.

"In a mortal hurry. The train starts 4.30."

Sir Patrick read the correspondence with breathless attention to the end. At the last lines of the last letter he did what he had not done before—looked at Anne. She was still at the window, and he crossed a room without the help of his wife's eyes.

Anne started; and turning round from the window, looked at him in silent surprise. He was under the influence of strong emotion; his face, his voice, his manner, all showed it.

"How long have you been in Scotland, when you wrote this?" He pointed to Anne's letter as he asked the question, putting it so eagerly that he absolutely forgot to look at her. "Not more than three weeks?" he added, with his bright black eyes fixed in absorbing interest on her face.

"Yes."

"Are you sure of that?"

"I am certain of it."

"You can refer to persons who have seen you?"

"Easily."

He turned the sheet of note-paper, and pointed to Geoffrey's penciled letter on the fourth page.

"How long had he been in Scotland, when he wrote this? More than three weeks, too?"

Anne considered for a moment.

"For God's sake be careful!" said Sir Patrick. "You don't know what depends on this. If your memory is not clear about it, say so."

"My memory is perfectly clear," she answered. It is clear again now. He had been at his brother's as Perthshire when I received his first letter that. And before he went to Swanhaven, he spent three or four days in the valley of the Esk."

"Are you sure again?"

"Quite sure!"

"Do you know of any one who saw him in the valley of the Esk?"

"I know of a person who took a note to him, from me."

"A person easily found?"

"Quite easily."

Sir Patrick laid aside the letter, and seized in ungovernable agitation on both her hands.

"Leave me," he said, "leave me. A whole conspiracy against Arnold Brinkworth and you falls to the ground before that correspondence. When you left me just now—"

He paused, and looked at her. He hands were beginning to tremble in his.

"When you and Arnold Brinkworth met at the inn," he resumed, "the law of Scotland had made you a married woman. You left me, and at the hour, when he wrote those lines at the end of his letter, to you, you were Geoffrey Delamayn's wedded wife!"

He stopped, and looked at her again.

Without a word to say in answer to that slightest movement in her head to foot, she looked back at him. The dark stillness of despair was in her face. The deadly cold of horror was in her hands.

In silence, on his side, Sir Patrick drew back a step, with a faint reflection of her dismay in his face. Married—to the villain who had not hesitated to assassinate the woman whom he had ruined, and then to cast her helpless on the world! Married—to the traitor who had not shrunk from betraying Arnold's trust in him, and desolating Arnold's home. Married—to the ruffian who would have struck her flat morning, if the hands of his own friends had not held him back. And Sir Patrick had never thought of it! Absorbed in the one isles of Blanche's future, he had never thought of it, till that horrible question face to face with him, of Anne's, and my future, too!

He came back to her. He took her cold hand once more in his.

"Forgive me," he said, "for thinking first of Blanche.

Blanche's name seemed to rouse her. The life came back to her face; the tender brightness began to shine again in her eyes. He saw that he might venture to speak more plainly still: he went on.

"I see the dreadful sacrifice as you see it. I ask myself, have I any right, has Blanche any right—"

She stopped him by a faint pressure of his hand.

"Yes," she said, softly, "if Blanche's happiness depends on it."

DREAMS.

It is a remarkable characteristic of the state of dreaming, that the mind often assimilates in the train of ideas it is pursuing those sensations that may strike upon the ear. The slumming of a door, for instance, is changed into the discharge of a gun, and the sensation of hearing it, no doubt, often changed by these interruptions. The bodily movements, again, which take place in sleep set the mind upon a new course of adventure, and possibly these extraneous sights and sounds are frequently caused by the very dreadful distractions which we all experience with visions we have in the night. This power of weaving fact into the substance of the fantastic stories we tell ourselves in the somnolent condition is a proof that the brain at such times is partially awake. Many persons who sleep in snatches have the power of continuing the thread of their dream after it has been broken by the wakeful state. In the act of dreaming many persons walk, leaving every appearance of sleep in the individuals. Maniacs very often unconsciously give a clew to the cause of their affliction in this manner. Secrets that they kept close during the day with the reticent cunning of their class, thus leak out in the silence of the night. Esquirol, we are told, utilized this fact in his own asylum by passing the night near the beds of patients whose history was unknown to him, and in this manner possessed himself of a key to their malady. That ideas occur to us in our sleep which we are not capable of in our waking state, the experience of every one proves. It is acknowledged that there is such a thing as unconscious cerebration; in other words, when we have cudgeled our brains to the utmost to solve mental work, and are compelled to give it up in disgust, it often occurs that, on awakening after a few hours' unconscious sleep, our ideas flow from our pen smoothly and swimmingly. This fact will account for the remarkable ease with which many difficulties are solved during sleep. It is related of Tartini, the famous composer, that after wearing himself ill in vainly attempting to finish a sonata, he fell asleep and dreamed of the theme that was upon his mind. He awoke from the devil appeared to him, and proposed to help him in his sonata, provided he would give him his soul in return. He agreed, and the devil at once composed the sonata oft-hand in the most charming manner. When he awoke, he rushed to his desk and put down the notes which still lingered in his memory, and the result was the masterly sonata which is now known by the name of the "Sonate du Diable."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

The arbitrary confinement in France of three or four prominent persons as lunatics, when it is pretty well supposed they are perfectly sane and not belligerent, has induced Frenchmen to make the perplexing inquiry, "Is this a lunatic?" The answer to this question certainly varies according to time, country, and custom. In the middle ages, a man of certain country would tend to make one doubt his own sanity, and to wish suspicion upon half his neighbors. But in France it is a very common thing for men to be confined who are no madder than three-fourths of their neighbors. A receiver, with whom the present French luxury lasts, no one can be shut up without a certificate from a physician; one being the doctor of the asylum where the alleged insane person is to be confined. Moreover, every writer, public and private, is subjected to an official inspection every three months. All this is quite certain, that these regulations are not effective. Great use is made of maisons de santé by French parents to bring sorely troublesome children to order. It is easy to induce the physician to sign a certificate that the refractory young person is suffering from excitement of the brain, and needs rest; and this power of locking up others extends to most all classes. The Paris Mail Gazette suggests that when M. Emile Ollivier has done with the gendarmes and other state appendages, he should devise a humane set of lunacy laws, and see that they are faithfully executed.

A prominent citizen of Bombay, his Highness Agasha Khan, has addressed a letter to the Bombay Times, requesting that her son, the Duke of Edinburgh, be sent back to Europe by her Majesty's Viceroy. Among other arguments to support this request, the Aga asserts that if the Duke is made Governor-General a very large reduction of army expenses would be possible, and a majority of the European troops in India might be withdrawn.

At the last regular meeting of the Geographical and Statistical Society, a silver medal was presented to Karl B. De Chaillu, from the Imperial Geographical Society of Paris, in acknowledgement of his journeys and discoveries in Equatorial Africa. The medal was presented by the Secretary of the New York society, and bears the following inscription: "Société de Géographie, Fondée en 1821, Reconnue d'Utilité Publique, Au voyageur au pays des Achangos, 1864-1869."

A new style of cheap one-story houses for laborers has been patented in London, and now they are being introduced into Berlin by the Prussian government. These houses are made of iron, of ordinary work, connected by cross-bars, and filled in between with three layers of straw, which are sewed together. The straw forming the roof is tied to a wooden ridge-pole to make it fire-proof, and the layers are well pressed together, after which they are covered with a coat of asphaltum on the outside, and mortar or plaster on the inside. The floor is laid with the straws lie horizontally, in the two others vertically, an arrangement which makes it soft and elastic. The roof is supported by iron beams, covered with corrugated iron and asphaltum, and may be used as a garden or yard, with a house underneath. The whole is found to be cheap, is thoroughly fire-proof, and warm in winter and cool in summer. The cost of these houses, in Prussia, Sweden, and its appendages, coats in London about three hundred dollars; with four rooms and the other necessary complements, less than five hundred dollars.

Among the remarkable circumstances connected with the chemistry of Hindostan was the experience of Professor Brown, a well-known vitalliste. At the moment of the disaster he was standing in an arcade leading from the governor's house. He heard the crash of the falling timbers, and saw the clouds of dust rising from the wreck, and the shrieks and confusion and by some inexplicable working of the imagination, the scene, as described above, seemed to become vividly impressed upon his mind. He knew that a horrible accident had taken place; but more than this he could not say. He was shocked as if by a sudden current; the nerves vibrated and tingled till they seemed as if in a constant state of tension. The sensation is yet confined to bed, but is improving under medical attention. Professor Brown is a reliable, middle-aged gentleman, was in vigorous health, and is not of an imaginative temperament.

Lady Franklin, though now eighty years of age, is indefatigable in searching for any item regarding her husband, of whom she still hopes to hear something definite. Recently she went to Rio on her way from England to Vancouver Island, to obtain a letter recording Sir John's visit to that port in expectation of some one living there, who refuses to deliver it to any one but Lady F., in person.

"Hauteville House" is a name interesting to all readers of current literature, as from that spot on the island of Guernsey the later productions of the great Victor Hugo have emanated. Hauteville House was formerly crown property, but, now, with its garden, belongs to Victor Hugo himself, he having purchased it for one thousand pounds. Externally it is an ordinary solid Guernsey-built house of three floors, and with unpretentious attics. The interior has been thoroughly metamorphosed to suit the fantastic taste of the master. An air of comfort, and even luxury, prevails in the whole, and no pains have been spared to make it house-like to its owner. Victor Hugo spends most of the year at Hauteville House, and he and his, and he is very methodical in his work. In diet he is extremely temperate, but always provides sumptuously for his guests. The drawing-room into which guests are generally shown is a large apartment, handsomely furnished. Adjoining this room is the bedroom of the late Madame Victor Hugo, which is regarded as a sanctum sanctorum by the poet. Here, generally, he there devotes some moments of quiet communion to thoughts of the departed one who has passed away to this room Madame Hugo seems to have collected every relic of her eldest daughter, Leopoldine, who was so unfortunately drowned in the Seine, with her husband, Charles Vaquerie. Perhaps one of the most touching mementoes is a colored crayon, executed by the mother herself, representing her young daughter, at the age of twelve, carelessly reclining on a sofa. Another equally touching memorial is a piece of unfinished work, the needle still in it, on which Madame Vaquerie was engaged when sudden death prevented her completion.

"Adam's Wedding" is the title of an amusing article in an English journal. The writer is of the opinion that, although Adam and Eve were rather strange to be married, yet on the whole they managed matters extremely well. There was no great parade about arrangements—every thing was plain and private, and the idea of a wedding in a garden is a very good taste. The bridal dress of the bride was simple enough, and banned paper if the singularity of early days was to continue. Her hair was in handsome order, no expensive cake, no fashionable ceremony, no costly gifts, no reception, no bridal tour, but only love and bliss!

The recent fires which have devastated the woods and mountains of various counties in New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania are the most extensive ever known in those sections. Some of these fires originated from the sparks from railroad and steam engines; others resulted from sparks from passing locomotives. It is also supposed that some of them were of incendiary origin, locally, probably, but kindled by parties or glory proclivities, who live in shanties on the hill-sides. So rapid was the spread of the fires that in several instances persons and families nearly escaped with their lives, leaving all behind them that a man, his wife, and child were hemmed in upon the rocks, and perished in the flames. The loss of property has been immense.

The following conversation was overheard between gentlemen on the Third Avenue between Yorkville and Harlem: "Where's this? Fifty-second street has already been paved, and now they are taking up the pavement again." "Waiting down a street, that's all," was the answer. "But why won't that done before?" pursued the gentleman. "That would have been stupid." "Just so," replied he. "Not half bad, is it?" This last response fully explains what otherwise would require several paragraphs to explain.

In it generally known by drivers of carts and coaches that there is an ordinance regulating the speed with which these vehicles may be driven through the streets of this city? Probably not. There was no information on this point had ever been diffused. This paragraph reserves attention to the fact that the speed for any cart, wagon, coach, public cart, or any other vehicle to be driven within any part of the limits of the city of New York at a greater speed than six miles an hour, nor shall it be lawful for any such vehicle to be driven around the corner of any of the streets of said city with the horse or horses attached thereto moving at a greater pace than a walk." It would be a comfort to pedestrians if a few of those racers around corners should be added to the above law that is now on the statute books.

A weak solution of phosphoric acid is said to be a strong poison for all kinds of insects, and yet to be harmless to plants. It is also said to kill potato-plant-blades in the soil. It is predicted that it will be extensively used in agriculture.

Curious "sells" some persons are. A Vermont man has informed Scientific Agriculture that his stable can be found an odd-steve a convenient safe for his books; but recently, when his kerosene lamps were was used, and, to his astonishment, the books were baked to a crisp. The stable was not burned, but only forwent, to a degree, the greatest care, the "baked books," and if they can be identified, the government will either pay their value or have the engineer locked up.

Tassieu, who embezzled nearly three million francs from the Rothschilds of Paris, has disclosed the way in which he was driven into such criminal dishonesty. About ten years ago, in a moment of pecuniary embarrassment, he borrowed from the bank with which he was intrusted five or six thousand francs. This he hoped to replace a little later, but was unfortunately obliged to replace a little later, but was unfortunately obliged to repeat the loan to Dr. Beckers, with whom he made acquaintance at a café. Some days after the latter called at the bank and asked him for a loan of some thousands. He at first refused, declaring that he was himself embarrassed for money. "I must have it," insisted Beckers, "or I will denounce you." "Where am I to get it?" replied Tassieu. "Where you got the other, parbleu!" Tassieu, finding himself in the other's power, advanced the sum; the loan was repeated by others; and Beckers at last persuaded Tassieu to gamble on the Bourse to make up the deficit. The speculation was unsuccessful, and, the abyss becoming wider, the catastrophe at length arrived.

The emancipation of children, and the formation of liberating societies, is going on in the Brazilian provinces, and Rio Janeiro is moving in the same direction. The Grand Orient, a Masonic order of Brazil, has resolved to promote emancipation; and a short time ago the Society for Liberal Freedom was established. Other children have been freed by different corporations; and between seventy and eighty adults have formed themselves into a society for the promotion of emancipation.

A SPONGE FISHER'S HOME, NEAR THE COAST OF CUBA.

SPONGE FISHERIES, COAST OF CUBA.

MANY of the shallow reefs that lie between the northeastern shores of Cuba and the Bahamas are dotted with marine villages, which, by their singular situation and mode of construction, recall the lacustrine cities of the antique world. They are the habitations of the sponge fishers, a hardy race, genuine toilers of the sea, whose acquaintance with dry land is limited to occasional visits to the neighboring islands for the purpose of procuring fresh water and provisions and disposing of their wares. Their huts, as shown in the above illustration, are built upon piles and rather slender poles, firmly fixed in crevices of the reef, and so bound together as to defy the fury of the tempest, while presenting but little resistance to the waves. The chief danger to be dreaded is, indeed, from the winds, as the shallow sea rarely rises into heavy waves on the broad surface of the reef.

In these huts, suspended between sea and sky, the hardy sponge fishers spend their toilsome lives. They are almost amphibious, and, indeed, appear to be much more at home in the water than on land. The huts are generally some distance apart, and the usual means of intercourse between the inhabitants is a rude kind of boat; but if no boat happens to be at hand, the sponge fisher who desires to visit a neighbor makes nothing of plunging into the water and swimming a distance of sometimes two or three miles. There is little danger from sharks, so long as the swimmer keeps in shallow water; though should he venture beyond the limits of the reef he would be instantly gobbled up.

The sponges from these reefs are mostly obtained by diving. They adhere firmly to the reef by a kind of root, and considerable force is required to tear them off. Most of the coarser kinds of sponge used in this country are obtained from these fisheries. When taken from the water they have a sickish, disagreeable color, which soon becomes putrid and disgusting, like decomposing animal matter. They are buried in sand, kept for the purpose in the huts; and when decomposition has ceased are exposed in open wire nets to the action of the tide. When thus purified they are carried ashore for sale.

The huts shown in our illustration were sketched on a reef some distance out from the port of Nuevitas, on the northeastern coast of Cuba.

A TOBACCO PLANTATION IN CUBA.

THE tobacco plantation of which we give a view on this page is situated near the pleasant city of Trinidad, on the southern coast of Cuba, in one of the most beautiful regions of the island. From the lofty mountain range that forms the back-ground of our picture the country slopes into a gently undulating plain, well watered by the rivers from which the city takes its name, fertile, exceptionally salubrious, and admirably adapted to the cultivation of tobacco. Some of the finest and most productive plantations are situated in this part of the island.

"A GAME OF FOX AND GEESE."

THE engraving from Mr. B. RIVIÈRE'S clever drawing, which we print on page 348, might serve as an illustration to one of ÆSOP'S fables. It represents nothing more than is to be credited to the cunning of the fox, and the equally proverbial foolishness of the goose. Monsieur Reynard has ventured from his hole in the cover to prowl about the open common; and, although no source of danger is discernible along the wide horizon, he is cautious, for it is daylight, and geese have wings, if no brains. The hunger which thins his flanks serves to sharpen his wits; so he stretches himself at full length, still as death, cunningly reckoning upon the curiosity of the geese to bring them within his reach.

WRESTLING.

WE give, on page 348, a picture of the interior of a London wrestling arena, from which our readers may gain some idea of a sport which is more popular in England than in any other country. Neither the French nor the Germans have the least conception of wrestling; and even in England it is conceded that the art has reached perfection only in Devon and Cornwall. We need not attempt to describe the various holds and falls which wrestlers practice. They are manifold, and must be described in technical language; and when the thing was done the reader would not be converted into a wrestler. It is a pity this famous athletic sport should not be more popular in this country. The accomplished wrestler uses every limb, every muscle indeed, and hence the superiority of the art over boxing, single-stick, and fencing.

REDUCED ROYALTY.

PERHAPS no case of royalty in reduced circumstances is so sad as that of the lion in his latter days. Frequent as are, in our times, the vicissitudes of monarchs, neither the deposed Queen of Spain at Biyonne, nor the exploded Bomba in Rome, nor, to look further back, Louis Philippe appearing suddenly in England as Mr. Smith, with a carpet-bag and cotton umbrella, is so melancholy a figure of fallen greatness as the King of the Solitudes in his old age. The first stage of his decline is marked by the inability any longer to spring on the nimble antelope, or to cope with the sturdy buffalo; and, against his better nature, the leonine Lear, still grand and imposing of aspect, but bereft of his power, is driven to watch for stray children going to the well, or old women picking sticks in the forest. It might be imagined that the sable philosophers of the bereaved tribe would regard this abduction of aged females as praiseworthy, or would at least consider the eating of them as a sufficient punishment for the offence. Not so, however; a lion once known as a man, woman, or child eater, is by no means encouraged, even in Africa, in the indulgence of his tastes; and what with constant interruptions, and the necessity for increased vigilance against his foes, he seldom enjoys a meal in peace. As his teeth fail and his joints stiffen, he is no longer able to capture the feebler crone, or to masticate the tenderest morsel, and, in the "last stage of all that ends this strange eventful history," he catches mice for a subsistence, gathers roots, sulks, and eyes out the insufficient diet with grim disgust. Imagine this incarnation of absolute power; this ruler in the blood of swift and powerful beasts; this emitter of the roar that causes all the beasts in the neighborhood to quake, driven, in what should be a majestic old age, to pick his own salads and to turn measer! The number of times that, with his large frame and corresponding appetite, he must perform for each scanty meal the degrading act of watching for and pouncing on a mouse, must ultimately deprave his whole character; daily he must sink lower in his own esteem; reformation and suicide are plainly before him; till, happily, the savage who comes upon his track, knowing by signs that he has been forced to graze, knows also that his feebleness is great; and finding him not far off, stretched and smooth a bath, in the sleep of exhaustion, or the torpor of self-contempt, consistently hastens with his assagai to draw a veil over the pitiful scene.

THE INTERNATIONAL YACHT RACE.

THE series of three races, sixty miles to windward and return, arranged between the American yacht Sappho and the English yacht Cambria, has resulted in a victory for the former. The first race took place May 10, in the English Channel, the starting-point being about sixty miles southeast of Cowes Roads, to which point the yachts were towed by steam-tugs. The Sappho carried thirty-two hands and a cloud of canvas, including, with her regular sails and oil sails, a mainstoppast-staysail and flying jib, while the Cambria set but one jib in addition to her foresail and other racing sails, and carried twenty-six hands.

The Cambria won the toss for position, and took the weather side. At half-past eight A.M. the signal to go was given. The Cambria took the lead from the start, and by the time she was off Bembry Head, about fifty miles from the starting-point, she was fully ten miles to windward of the Cambria. The latter, seeing it was impossible to win, returned to Cowes without rounding the umpire's steamer.

The second race was set down for Saturday, May 14. The interim was employed in making certain alterations in the Cambria, to enable her to compete on better terms with her opponent. In accordance with a proposition made by Mr. ASHBURY, the owner of the Cambria, the distance to be sailed has been reduced from sixty to thirty miles, and the course for the second race was laid in a southwesterly direction across the Channel, starting from Cowes and terminating at the port of Cherbourg, in France. The weather was pleasant, and a vast concourse of people assembled to witness the race. The yachts made a prompt appearance, and all being in readiness, the umpires gave the signal to take position. To the surprise and disappointment of all, the Cambria refused, and when the starting gun was fired, at a quarter to eight, the Sappho got under way alone. A few minutes afterward the Cambria started, and followed a short distance; then backing, she returned to Cowes, and allowed the race to go by default. The reason assigned by Mr. ASHBURY for his refusal to continue the race is that he objected to the start given by the umpire, and that the new course was in direct violation of the conditions and stipulations made with Mr. DUCIELLA, of the Sappho, previous to the race.

These two yachts, of which we give accurate portraits on page 345, are both admirable specimens of naval architecture. The Sappho, launched in April, 1868, is a beautiful model, and has already been regarded as the champion English yacht. Her dimensions are 94 feet on deck from stem to stern-post, 21 feet beam, and 11 feet 6 inches, according to the Royal Thames Yacht Club measurement, she rates at 188 tons. By New York Club measurement she rates 248 tons. During the past three or four months great efforts have been made to put her in readiness for her race with the Sappho, and her contest on the 4th of July with the Dauntless. Her bulwarks have been raised, her counter enlarged, more ballast has been stowed in her hull, and her spars have been lightened by boring them. She has had a brilliant history, and has never been beaten in many contests. Last August she beat the Sappho and, in the same race, three first English yachts—the Aline, Gossard, and Coudor.

The Sappho was built in 1867 by the Messrs. POTTER, of Brooklyn. She is a keel vessel, built of 2¾ tons, New York Club measurement, 125 feet long, 25 feet beam, and 11 feet depth of hold. Rig has been somewhat changed during the winter, and the amount of sail she spreads is almost incredible. In light airs there is not an inch of space within the limits of the stays through which the sky is visible. To give her greater buoyancy under this immense spread of canvas, her width between the fore and main masts was recently increased by "hipping"—that is, by planking on the original frame-work below the water-line. Her bows are very long and lean, and her lines forward nearly straight. Her bowsprit is built in, thus securing greater strength with less weight than by the usual plan.

PHILADELPHIA HAILSTONES.

THE sketches below are accurate representations of the hailstones that fell during the recent severe storm in Philadelphia, showing their size and curiously crystallized character. In the obverse, the crystals start from a centre, and the whole structure resembles the broken end of a corn-cob. The reverse shows a hollow form, with the radiating crystals visible through the translucent covering of ice. These drawings are from actual measurements and are not exaggerated in size. Some of the hailstones picked up after the storm measured six inches in length, and many seven and eight inches in circumference.

OLD IRISH HOSPITALITY.

IN the good old days before the "Union" there was exercised in Ireland an amount of "hard living" scarcely credible in our time. As of unexplainable mutations of the period was Shane's Castle, in the North of Ireland, the residence of the O'Neill family; and in "the Conversallis Correspondence," there are published "Rules to be regarded at Shane's Castle, drafted by Lord Mountjoy, 20th of November, 1785, which, though of course intended as amusement for the guests, afford evidence that the life of the times was fast indeed.

"1st Rule. That no noise be made during the forenoon, for fear of wakening the company.—2nd. That there shall be no breakfast made after four o'clock in the afternoon, or too after in the morning.—3d. To inform my stranger who may come in at breakfast that we are not at dinner.—4th. That no person be permitted to go out sitting after breakfast till the noon gets up, for fear of being overturned in the dark.—5th. That the respective grooms may put up their horses after four hours' parading before the hall-door of the castle.—6th. That there shall be one complete bowl before each meal.—7th. That all the company must assemble at dinner before the cloth is removed.—8th. That supper may not be called for till five minutes after the last glass of claret.—9th. That no gentleman be permitted to drink more than three bottles of Hock or after supper.—10th. That all members of Parliament shall assemble on post days in the coffee-room at four o'clock to frank letters."

BEWARE OF LEAD POISONS

In the form of liquid washes for the complexion or mineral cosmetics that ruin and shorten life. There is but one way of removing impurity from the complexion, and that is by removing it from the skin. This desideratum is achieved by taking STAFFORD'S IRON AND SULPHUR POWDERS, one ailment of which infuses new life into the torpid circulation, while the other separates from the blood the infectious principle which causes eruptions, pimples and discolorations, and sends them to the surface with the perspiration, whence they are washed through the sieve-like structure of the epidermis.

Sold by all druggists. 1 Package, 12 Powders, $1; 6 Packages, $5; $2.00. Mailed free. Money sent at our risk.—HALL & RUCKEL, 218 Greenwich Street, N. Y.

PEARLS AND RESETS.—When rosy lips part, pearls should glitter behind them. To preserve and beautify the dental organs there is no preparation like SOZODONT, a compound of the most wholesome vegetable substances, among which the bark of the South American Soap-Tree, known to the natives as Quillaya, is the most efficacious. Americans for cleansing, without injuring, use most delicate fabrics, is the most important. [ADV.]

THRICE ARMED!

Thrice is he armed who keeps within reach of his hand a specific that at one and the same time will strengthen, regulate, and purify his system when enfeebled, disordered, and corrupted.

Such is the three-fold preparation of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, and hence the great superiority of that standard vegetable remedy over all medicines that are merely tonics, and nothing else. The effect of the ordinary astringent tinctures and extracts upon the bowels is temporary, and upon the depraved blood or bile they produce no beneficial effects whatever. Dyspepsia will not be eradicated all the foods and tonics of the body are more or less infected, and the bowels are often badly deranged. An unassociated astringent—quinine, for instance—does infinitely more harm than good in such cases. In on the other hand, the stimulating and tonic elements are qualified with sweetness and aromatic ingredients. The finest laxatives and blood deporents in the vegetable kingdom are intermixed with those of a purely invigorating nature, and under the operation of this admirable combination the three important processes of digestion, assimilation, and purification go on together. The rapidity with which the disordered organization restores to its natural condition under a course of the Bitters is due to this cause. Every disturbed function of the body is favorably affected by the various properties of this comprehensive and well-balanced preparation. As a general rule, the bowels are noted to be irregular, costive, and the feces more liable to become vitiated in spring and summer than in winter, and hence the Bitters are especially valuable as a spring and summer alterative, corrective, and invigorant. At all seasons, where the seeds of intermittent fevers infect the air, this healthful vegetable elixir need be taken as a preventive medicine.

REMEDY FOR PIMPLES.

To all who desire it the undersigned will mail (free), on receipt of 6c. stamp, the recipe and full directions for preparing and using a Genuine Vegetable Balm that will immediately remove Pimples, Freckles, Blotches, Tan, Sunburn Spots, and all other disfigurations of the skin, leaving the same clear, with a healthy glow. The will also forward instructions for producing a growth of hair on a bald head or smooth face.

Their Century Chewing Tobacco is now made of choice virginia, sun-dried, and aged and not the best stainable wrinkle.

LORILLARD'S Yacht-Club Smoking is made of Orronoko, or Hyco Leaf, of N. C. and Va., selected especially for the finest cigarettes for the purpose ever found, and prepared by an original and patented process, whereby the bitter and irritating qualities, as well as the nicotine, is extracted, rendering it mild and mellow to nervous constitutions, it is a delightful aroma, leaves no disagreeable taste, and will not burn the longest of a pipe bit in two.

The Eureka Smoking is also a favorite Brand, the result of choice Virginia, and always of one free and smooth: has an agreeable flavor, but is of heavier body than the Yacht-Club, and is sweet in price; by mixing these two together an outcome of any desired strength can be obtained.

As an evidence of the popularity of Lorillard's Smoking, we would say over 100,000 pounds of cigares were sold during 1869, and still the demand increases.

The celebrated IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins' Metal," (Non-Oxidizing). Our Improved Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation for time and durability is so well established, that we recommend them to the trade and the public as the best and cheapest watches in the market, equal in appearance to gold watches costing $100. These of extra fine finish, $10, equal to $100 gold case. We are also making an extra heavy and extra fine watch, fully jeweled patent lever, equaling in appearance a $250 gold watch. For these we guarantee accuracy. We charge only $15. All our watches fully guaranteed by special certificate. All our watches are in hunting cases, gents' and ladies' sizes. Chains, Collins Metal, $1 or $2. Also, all kinds of Jewelry, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.
Collins' Metal is the best imitation of gold we have seen.—N. Y. Tribune.

The goods of C. E. Collins & Co. have invariably given satisfaction.—N. Y. Times.
One of the $20 Watches is worn in our office, and we have no hesitation in recommending them.—Pomeroy's Democrat.
TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.

Harper's Bazar.

A REPOSITORY OF
FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most rapid and unprecedented ever known in the annals of journalism, and is recognized as the best and most attractive family paper published. The unlimited Journalistic Field of Fashion it is without a rival in this country. By a special arrangement, involving great expense, with the publishers of the Berlin Bazar—the leading journal of Fashion in Europe—its Fashion-plates are published in New York simultaneously with their appearance in Berlin and Paris.

A large portion of the BAZAR is every week devoted to instructive and entertaining reading-matter—Stories, Travels, Descriptive Sketches, Gossip. The Editorial articles are always spicy, and cover every topic of social interest. No effort and no expense will be spared to permanently secure for this journal the victory which it has won so rapidly, and which it so well deserves.

The most ample arrangements to supply the readers of the BAZAR with not paper Fashions, and the beautiful Work-patterns which are the delight of the ladies, are made and supplemented, and shall not be surpassed by the best Parisian dressmakers, in conjunction with good artists, with a view to produce fashions truly artistic. These patterns, so carefully adjusted that they can be used by all without assistance, will be sent FREE, prepaid, on the receipt of Twenty-five Cents for the Number containing them, or equivalent stamps at the same discount.

In the BAZAR for April 16 was commenced "The Cruptonians," a serial story of thrilling interest, by the Author of "Lord and Creoss." "Nine Lodge Girls," &c., positively illustrated.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and a commentary upon all the important events of the time. Into its columns is gathered the cream of the foreign and local interest. The best artists in the country are constantly employed to make pictorial illustrations, and the Publishers are also largely indebted to photographs and sketches by their own artists, and by correspondents in all parts of the world, for original and valuable illustrations.

As a LITERARY JOURNAL, HARPER'S WEEKLY is recognized as the best illustrated publication in America. It has ever succeeded in establishing and maintaining a high literary character.

The Editorial matter of HARPER'S WEEKLY consists of able and timely discussions of the various important weekly articles upon National Politics, Finance, Commerce, and miscellaneous topics.

The Best Monthly Periodical, not in the country alone, but in the English language.—The Press, Phila.

Harper's Magazine.

The MAY Number completes the Fortieth Vol. of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. Its success hitherto—unrivaled by any periodical publication heretofore issued in Europe or America—has been due to the popular character and variety of its contents, and to the enterprise of the Publishers in securing for its pages, at any cost, the best literary contributions and the most skillful pictorial aid. In its profusely-illustrated articles of Travel and Exploration, in its Historical Papers, in its Essays on Literature and Art, in its Papers upon subjects connected with the mechanical improvements of the age, and upon Scientific Topics, in its Tales and Stories and Letters of the special Editorial Departments—to which recently a new one has been added, viz., the Record of Scientific Record. The elements upon which the past success of the MAGAZINE has been based will still continue to be its leading characteristics; and its Publishers are confident that the most unusual attention to the wants of the reading public they will be able to enhance even the present reputation.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains every month two hundred pages of reading matter more than any similar periodical published at the same price. This fact, the uniformly low rate at the disposal of its Publishers will enable them to furnish to all the subscribers to HARPER'S MAGAZINE

MAKING ARROWS.

OUR illustration on this page represents a group of Indians seated at the door of a frontier fort, and engaged in the work of making arrows, which is generally intrusted by the warrior to his better half. The bow is still the favorite, as it is the natural, weapon of the Western Indian. He may become very expert with the rifle, and is now rarely without a breech-loader of the most recent and best pattern, as well as a couple of heavy revolvers. On foot he will use these with great skill; but when horseback, and especially when in rapid retreat, he indiscriminately takes to the bow, which he handles with marvelous dexterity. He always tries to keep to the right of his pursuer, and if the chase becomes too sharp, he will slip on one side, so as to bring the body of his pony between himself and his enemy, and, grasping his bow and five or six arrows in the left hand, will discharge them with such rapidity that sometimes two or three arrows will be flying through the air at once, a peculiar motion of the fingers of the left hand bringing an arrow to the string the instant one has been discharged. The range for a good bow varies from three to four hundred yards, and a strong man has been known to drive an arrow-head through an inch plank at a distance of one hundred yards.

Indian arrows are always made of ash or hickory, toughness being an essential quality. In ancient times the heads were rudely hammered out of flint, but now they are made from hoop-iron, and are of course much more effective.—For hunting, the string-notch is made parallel with the flat of the arrow-head, to keep it in the best position for piercing between the ribs of the buffalo and other game; while for war, the notch is at right angles with the flat of the arrow-head, to accommodate the position of the ribs in the human body. War-arrows are sometimes, though rarely, poisoned, either with the venom of the rattlesnake or by being inserted in putrid flesh, and afterward dipped in a kind of glue, which protects the poison until mostened by the victim's blood. A means of death quite as effective as poison are grooves cut in the wood of the arrows, which prevent the wound from closing tight, and allow the blood to drain slowly but surely away, as the arrow can not be withdrawn. The Indian in our illustration is probably engaged in the work of cutting these murderous grooves.

MAKING ARROWS.—(DRAWN BY W. M. CARY.)

MAN AND BEAST.

THE relation between man and his cotenants of the globe would have been altogether delightful but for one unlucky circumstance—a circumstance which, far from being inevitable or natural, is one of the insoluble problems of the earth, and has caused a terrible jar and discord in creation—namely, the fact that one animal is food for another. No doubt, as matters stand, beasts and birds of prey must follow their nature; the taxing of flesh and the picking of bones are the correlatives of fangs and grinders, beaks and talons; and the comparative anatomist is compelled to coincide with that practical Yankee who, being told that in the days of the deer, and the beaver, whose bones strew the site of his dwellings. His first garments were torn from the backs they grew on. His first business was the chase. It was perhaps in this way that the germ of destructiveness, implanted by instinct and ever-pressing necessity in the aboriginal breast, struck such deep root that, in all succeeding ages, every corner of the inhabited earth has been a shambles. In the pride of that power which, through the faculty of speech, man possesses, of combining forces and transmitting knowledge, he has exercised ruthlessly his dominion over the beast of the field and the fowl of the air. Wherever he has held sway, there have all other creatures drawn their puniest breath in subjection, unchampioned and unpitied. If in an imaginary paradise of animals we simply introduce the figure of a native, the whole scene changes. That lean, low-browed, flat-nosed caricature of humanity, more like a painter's lay-figure than a sculptor's model—full of propensities much viler than those of the animals around him—selfish, remorseless, faithless, treacherous—is monarch of all he surveys. The birds have learned the power of the poisoned arrow—the beasts have a wholesome dread of the ambush and the snare. That bronze-colored being, distinguished from the ape chiefly by superior malevolence and articulate speech, walks surrounded by a wide circle of fear. The creatures around him have learned, and taught their young, the lesson that he is a malignant as he is powerful. Only a few lions, and he will depopulate whole regions of their animals. The gigantic moa no longer stalks over the hills of New Zealand. The moose disappears from the east of the American continent as the buffalo from the west. South Africa, but used to teem with wild herds, crowding the wide landscape up to the horizon, and astounding the traveler with the magnificent spectacle of tribes of antelopes, zebras, and giraffes hiding the plain, elephants and rhinoceros browsing serenely amidst the clumps of trees, and hippopotami swarming in the rivers, has, since the negroes were supplied with guns, been almost swept of its game, and in some cases not only have the birds disappeared, but the very moles and mice are growing scarce. In fact, in all the lands the savage gluts himself with slaughter. Nor is his civilized brother behind him in the propensity to destroy, which nothing but the interest of proprietorship avails to check. Sometimes, in distant seas, new tracts of coast have been discovered abounding in seals, and straightway crews of enterprising mariners have arrived armed with spears and clubs, who have wallowed in slaughter, never ceasing to stab and strike till all that hapless and harmless life was extinct, no tenants again forever lending cheer to those desolate shores, the gray sandy sea no more rippled by their sports.—Wherever there is no law for the river or the lake, the inhabitants of the flood disappear—even the countless tribes of the ocean are being rapidly thinned by the insatiate rapacity of man.

But not for his bodily needs alone has the human animal been so lavish in destroying other lives. His spiritual interests have also demanded much of that kind of prodigality. A devil, under one form or another, lies at the root of many religions; and many, in their infancies, have recognized the duty of propitiating the unseen powers by sacrifice. In most lands the supplications of the savage to his deity are written in blood; and his petitions, often foolish and often wicked, are thought to be more palatable if they ascend in the smoke of burnt offerings. As civilization advances, sacrifice grows more ceremonial—butchery becomes a priestly function; and the ancient world was filled with blood-stained altars, the mythology of its peoples with prescribed modes of reverence.

MILLENNIUM the lion and the lamb will lie down together, said, "he expected the lamb would lie down inside the lion." Now is there any sign of relaxation in the vigor with which man continues to devour fish, flesh, and fowl; and no individual human stomach reaches maturity without sacrificing whole hecatombs of victims by the way.

The earliest trace of man on the earth is the flint weapon with which he slew the bear, the tial slaughter, and the assignment to particular deities of particular victims. "Moloch, horrid king," has been worshiped, though not always under that name, in many lands and in many ages; his grinning image has looked down on Druids with their wicker idols filled with victims, and on Aztec priests laying hearts yet beating on his altar-stone. Even in our day, his votary the Thug makes assassination the chief article of religion, and the king of Dahomey floats his consecrated canoe in human blood.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1870.

☞ A very interesting account of DAVID'S TRAVELS IN ASSYRIA, superbly illustrated from his own sketches, was commenced in the WEEKLY *for May 28, and will be continued in the present Number. THE SITUATION.

WHEN the Republican members of the New York Legislature marched in upon the Tammany Ring we ventured to suggest that they had made a mistake; and when they pleaded that they had secured an efficient election law as the consideration, it was evident that they chose to forget the politics and the politicians of the city. The bargain was completed. The city was literally bound and delivered to the Ring; and now an election has taken place. It is confessedly the most unblushingly corrupt that was ever known. There was not a pretense of honesty. In certain wards there were three or four times as many votes cast as there are legal voters. Repeaters marched in squads from poll to poll. It was the most shameless travesty of a popular election; the total overthrow of popular government. Of course the Ring exclaimed next morning that the city had done "well." Of course it characteristically insinuated that the colored voters had done all the cheating. And the country has now had another illustration of the character and tendency of Democratic rule.

The election of the 17th of May was tentative. The Ring wished to try its power and its new system. That system, which the Republican members of the Legislature helped to establish, is intended to secure the success of the next President by determining the vote of the State of New York. It is supposed that in the reaction which is expected to follow the final victory of the Republicans in the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment the electoral vote of so many States will be cast that the next New York may turn the scale. If that should be so —if it should happen that New York decided the election, as in 1844, and it were known that the vote of the State had been determined by the frauds in the city—there is not a sensible man in the Union who does not see what the nature of the peril that would threaten us. The leaders of the rebellion and their political friends would have come into power by the back door. It is unnecessary to point out the possible consequences.

When the candidates for judges who have been successful were nominated, Mr. RICHARD O'GORMAN, one of the Tammany managers, declared that Democratic principles were wanted upon the highest bench in New York for party purposes. Those purposes involved defiance of the government of the United States springing out of the rebellion. The logic of politicians was that the State might be arrayed against the nation. The Democratic withdrawal of assent to the Fifteenth Amendment in New York, and opposition in the Senate of the United States to the provisions for enforcing the amendment, are the offspring of the same spirit. The Democratic hostility at every point in the State and in the nation is founded upon the political theories which the war was supposed to have settled. It has been said that in the late New York election old issues were wisely forgotten. The truth is, that no issues were discussed. It is perfectly well known that the political body called Copperhead has not in the least changed its views upon any point of the war; and the party upon which a few weeks before was vociferous about "war to the knife" upon the King, strenuously supported the candidates which the King had given to its party. The election over, the same paper which recently declared that the Democratic party, handicapped with the Ring, could not possibly hope for success, now that the rule of the Ring is more inflexible and assured than ever, exults in what it considers to be the prospect of sure Democratic victory.

Neither the people of this State nor of the country should be deceived. Old issues can not be set aside until they are settled. The mere ascendency of a party, and the adoption of certain measures, do not settle issues. Nothing disposes of a political issue but general acquiescence. There is, indeed, one point in our controversy which has been settled, and that is emancipation. No party wishes or would try to restore chattel slavery. But all the political equality of the negro is a settled issue? No one who is familiar with Democratic politics asserts it. Some Democrats think it ought to be settled; but they do not deny that the party has not acquiesced. Is the honest payment of the debt a settled issue? Is what is called State Sovereignty a settled issue? On the contrary, the great questions of the war, excepting that of personal freedom, are still open. No Democratic convention has heartily expressed acquiescence in their settlement; nor is there any body who does not know that, if the Democratic party came into power, every one of those questions might instantly become threatening.

It is not a time, therefore, to assume that the old things having passed away, all things have become new, and that it is not of very vital importance whether or not the Democratic party is successful. Old things have not passed away. The tremendous issues involved in the war can not suddenly subside and leave it, in five years, a matter of indifference to the country whether the party in power is disloyal or shall control its government. It is the forgetfulness of this fact in Washington, and by many leading Republican papers, which has caused an appearance of discord in the party. The West Indian policy of the Administration, for instance, is very much like it. Honest Republicans are opposed to it. By dividing the sentiment of the party, it tends to keep open and unsettled the whole question of annexation. Indifference to the civil service reform is another blunder. The country is heavily taxed. There is a conviction that the present use of public service is loose and wasteful, to say no more. A reformed civil service is a proposition for economical honesty which every taxpayer can understand. He would favor it. But "the politicians" have thus far baffled it.

The enormous power of the Republican party, which the Democratic party could prevent, and does not, are now an essential weapon of that party for securing the future peace of the country. With that ascendency comes no acquiescence in the settlements of the war, but the bitterest hostility to them. With that ascendency comes possible repudiation and the attempt to invalidate the Fifteenth Amendment. Could there be any more disastrous blow to advantage to the welfare of the country is promised by Democratic success? The sole hope of the national prosperity and prosperity of the Union lies in the continued predominance of the Republican party.

LABOULAYE AND THE EMPIRE.

THE rumored appointment of M. EDOUARD LABOULAYE as Minister of Public Instruction in France has excited a great deal of surprise in this country. The fact is, he is so well known to us as a Liberal—he was so intelligently and strenuously a friend of this country during the terrible days of the slave power, that such a rumor is believed to be curiously erroneous, or to indicate a total renunciation of liberal principles. But it is impossible to say, even, that the telegraph was in error in reporting that M. LABOULAYE had written a letter in favor of voting Aye upon the Napoleonic question of the Emperor; and it is known that his son has been appointed Secretary of Legation to the imperial Embassy at Constantinople. As M. LABOULAYE is not accustomed to conceal his sentiments, and has frequently expressed them fully in his letter upon the plebiscitum, and as we chance to know exactly what they are, from his own lips, and communicate very fully with friends in this country, it is only fair that his position should be accurately stated. Most of the political correspondence which now receives papers from France is so violently partisan that it is extremely interesting to have the views of a French Liberal like LABOULAYE at first hand.

M. OLLIVIER, the Prime Minister, is one of LABOULAYE'S friends, and LABOULAYE himself has been placed upon the committee which drafts commissions not only for the sake of his advice, but of his name, and he has not felt it to be his duty to decline. Many Republican forms have evidently little value for him in contrast with political advantages. He is willing to serve his country in what he believes to be the cause of liberty in the most promising way; and he does not hesitate to say that he prefers the liberal empire to the republic with which those who call themselves republicans threaten France. LABOULAYE thinks that the French Reds, as they are called, or extreme republicans of the ROCHEFORT type who lead the movement, are heirs of all the madness of the Revolution, and are the most desperate of men. Their dream, in his judgment, is to establish a single assembly which should govern France at its pleasure; and LABOULAYE is suspected by them because he insists that two chambers are essential to the liberty of the country. He is very sure that in the United States there is no conception of the ignorance of the French republicans as a body. They have, in his view, no taste for religious liberty nor for liberty of education; and are the most intolerant of men.

When he tells them that the object of the constitution of a free country is to secure the liberty of the people and to impose upon the legislative power limits which it can not pass, they look at him in amazement and can not understand him.

In a word, LABOULAYE thinks that the chances of progressive liberty in France are surer under LOUIS NAPOLEON, with the changes in the Constitution, than they are under a revolution. Therefore, when the proposition of the change was made, and the republicans announced that they should vote No, and that No meant revolution and the overthrow of the empire, LABOULAYE was sure that they had secured the success of the Emperor, because no nation ever deliberately accepts revolution. He was confident that all the peasants would vote for the Emperor, because he is a NAPOLEON, and all the moderates, because, after fourteen or fifteen revolutions in eighty years, they fear anarchy. The question was a dilemma. One side or the other must be taken. And LABOULAYE took that which seemed to him to promise most for France and liberty. Free liberty, he holds, is the liberty of the citizen; and in France, under the conditions of to-day, he has no opinion whatever that that liberty is more secure under a liberal empire than under a despotic republic.

In this very honest feeling lies the explanation of his conduct; and in the conviction of his sincere support of the empire as the least of two evils we find the explanation of the rumor or the fact of the Emperor's offer. At the present time, and in the necessary ignorance of the real facts, LABOULAYE'S position will be honorably interpreted by those who know and respect him, from their confidence in his character and principles. It is not necessary by those who most loudly vociferate "Republic" and "No" are the best friends of the idea. Every one has a way; and whatever may be thought of the conduct of the new ministry in France, no man can wonder that a country hesitates to vote for the whirlwind, with M. HENRI ROCHEFORT to ride upon it.

THE STATE OF TRADE.

THE spring trade is nearly over, but owing to light sales by country dealers throughout the season, of nearly all commodities, purchases are still necessary, and the prospect is that the trade will be prolonged to an unusual extent; although none suppose that the aggregate will equal that of any year since the termination of the war. The losses upon goods this year have fallen upon the importers and jobbers, more than upon dealers in interior, and the losses are regarded as being in improved circumstances. It is, however, thought that, taking the whole United States over, trade and all classes of employments, our trade and industry for the last eight months have not been profitable.

Considering the situation this year, it seems to be admitted that we manufacture too many goods, and yet the production is below the average of the country in nearly all the departments, except fine broadcloths and silks. An unusual stimulus was given to manufacture at the end of last year by the necessities of the war, and notwithstanding the large immigration into this country, the manufacture exceeds the actual consumption. So far as cotton goods are concerned, they are now generally produced in excess of the wants of the country. The South was obliged to diversify its industry, and has established numerous mills for the manufacture of domestics, which, in the coarser fabrics, compete successfully with older establishments. Prints and domestics are produced too extensively. The tendency to their being depressed unusually low, have lately advanced in price; but domestics have fallen perhaps two per cent. within about a month. A slight change in the make of skirts for under garments has had an effect upon the consumption of cotton goods. Instead of about 20 yards, which are now universally gored, with a saving of a yard or more of the fabric in each garment. At the number of skirts worn, which may be estimated at ten millions, some having two, and the more favored as many as twenty, of these articles, the saving is immense, and the course of safety against fire, is very important. If the whole population were profitably employed, it is barely possible that the country, with the very improved demand for these manufactures as to keep the mills at work with advantage; but at present there is an excess of production, which communicates uncertainty to business. Some woolen manufacturers produce special articles which are sold ahead; but these are exceptions.

We lately gave an account of the condition of the carpet manufacturers who made their goods mostly on commission, or ingrain, showing that they were dropping off, one after another, as their looms became disengaged, in the hope that in the course of the summer they would be at work again to prepare for the fall trade. Brussels carpets of the best styles and make are in demand, due to the fact that the importation slackened after January, owing to the depressed condition of trade for some time after the season had opened.

The depressed condition of trade, until the rebound in gold from 110¼, which was about its lowest point, was due to the fact that the price of nearly all productions kept pace with the fluctuations in gold. The great power and dealer felt it first in the Northern States, and the cotton planter in the Southern. As the trade of the country rests upon their success, so their weakness is communicated to the whole Union, the respective localities where breadstuffs and cotton are produced were differently influenced by the fall in gold. In the South, owing to the prices ever received for the cotton crop of the year 1868–69, and to a community of interest among the people of the Cotton States, the effort to keep up the cotton crop under unfavorable circumstances, in which they were powerfully aided by the belief that the whole surplus would be required by foreign manufacturers. It appears, from the returns made in England for the first three months of the year, that the amount of cotton cloth exported within that time exceeds the export for the same period in 1869 to the extent of 79,000,000 yards, and the fact of the excess in exports of goods alone amounted to 4,000,000 pounds. But, what is equally important, the population of Great Britain, which was decreased severely from the great panic of 1866, have been for some months in an improved condition, and have become consumers of their own manufactures. At a meeting of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, held in the latter part of April, the improvement was commented upon, and it was apparent, as other sources of supply had partially failed, that there would be a necessity for taking the whole surplus of cotton raised in this country.

When the export of the crop of last year commenced it was supposed that it would amount to about 2,700,000 bales; but within the last month it has for the first time been estimated that it would reach 3,000,000. If its full extent had been known at the outset, the difficulty in maintaining the price would have been greatly lessened. The fall in gold to September meddling cotton was about 29 cents, to which price it had fallen from 35 cents. Its fall to only about 29 cents, while gold had fallen from, say, 132 to 110¼, was due to favorable circumstances, and to a combination which embraced the whole financial strength of the Cotton States.

We have already referred to the fact stated in the Liverpool circulars, that the improved condition of English trade and manufactures was owing to the prolonged period of cheap provisions. The failure of Sepoy rebellion struck the Northern States the dealers in grain became weak, and they were unable to uphold its price, which went down with gold, and was conformity to the subsequent fall in gold required. The London and Liverpool dealers were able to offset the decline in gold on cotton to the limits expected, by the success with which, aided by the fall in gold and the great consequent depression here, they were able, from time to time, to lower their limits in purchasing grain from New York. The slaughter of this great staple was thus prevented at Liverpool. Shipments of grain were made from St. Louis by way of New Orleans; but recent advices show that the stocks there and at Liverpool are in order. Suits for damage have been commenced on this account, and it is probable that this experiment will be at an end.

Recent advices from the other side show that, owing to the necessity of calling upon grain in consequence of the failure of the cotton crop, England to sell on account of bad prospects for the growing crop, there has been an advance of of two shillings per quarter. Later advices, however, state that the weather had improved and prices were stationary. It is reasonable, however, to hope for a better supply of the other side, and the probability that the pressure upon gold, if continued, will no longer be successful in the control of the country for the residue of the year will stand on an improved basis.

SECTS AND POLITICS.

THE mission to Rome was always unnecessary, and was wisely abolished some years ago. When the bill for diplomatic appropriations came up the other day in the Senate, Mr. JAMES BROOKS moved to restore it, and to omit the mission to Guatemala. A very useful debate unquestionably followed, provoked by the gross misrepresentation which Mr. BROOKS made of a remark of Mr. DAWES. That gentleman said that we had very little commercial intercourse with Rome, where we have a consul, and that the reason urged by his colleague, Mr. BOWEN, namely, that it was a "spiritual power," was the very reason why we should not have political relations with it. As a very good and proper remark, and should have settled the question. But Mr. BROOKS and his friends, Mr. COX and Mr. VOORHEES, wanted to make political capital by seeming to favor a friendly policy toward the seat of the Roman Catholic primacy. Mr. BROOKS immediately fell upon Mr. DAWES, as representing "the Puritan element," and as preferring Turkey to Rome, the Moslem to the Christian; upon which Mr. DAWES fell back upon Mr. BROOKS, and pulverized him. Mr. BINGHAM made a vigorous attack upon the Pope's Syllabus, following it up by a sneering denial of the claims of Rome to be the patron of science and the mother of arts; and he said some very plain, but very irrelevant truths of the Papacy.

The engagement now became general. Mr. VOORHEES tried to give a personal turn to Mr. BINGHAM's remarks, and charged the Republican party with "never loving" the Roman Catholic Church. He also had a fling at him lustily with sneers at Massachusetts, as the State in which witches and convents were burned. Mr. HOAR, of that State, replied, correcting Mr. VOORHEES in his history; stating that no human being had ever been burned at the stake within the limits of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, and showing that Massachusetts was just as responsible for the mob that burned the Ursuline Convent as New Jersey for the mob that attacked Miss EDITH O'GORMAN the other evening at Madison, or as the State of New York for the shooting of Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. HOAR ended by suggesting that complaints of ancient cruelties come with as ill grace from those whose political friends had recently slain our soldiers at Fort Pillow, and had burned orphan asylums and hung negroes in New York. Mr. VOORHEES replied that every word was false, and refused to withdraw his assertion. His words were taken down and ruled out of order, and Mr. HOAR's were also taken down, and ruled to be pungent, but not unparliamentary.

This debate shows how considerable and inflammable an element Roman Catholicism is becoming in our politics. Those who belong to that sect are the only citizens who, as a sect, make political demands, and propose fundamental political changes. It is all absurd, as we have always said. They are also the only citizens among whom there is the open intolerance of public discussion, which is the strength of riots which defeated the election of MIKE O'GORMAN. They may be very false and foolish lectures, but a riot is not the remedy for falsehood and folly. Meanwhile the partisan and obstruction of a religious sect into politics is encouraged by such conduct as that of Mr. BROOKS and his companions. It is perhaps quite safe to say that if Mr. BROOKS had not known that very many of his constituents were Roman Catholics he would not have moved to restore the mission to Rome; and a more pitiful political performance it is not easy to imagine in a true American representative. It is one of the most disgraceful events of the session. But it is full of suggestion.

DR. LANAHAN AND THE BOOK CONCERN.

A WRONG cause will never end well. HOLCOMBE has illustrated this truth in the most signal of vigor, but not more pointedly than the Committee of the Methodist Book Concern. It is now nearly a year since there were rumors of fraud in the management of the publication department of that institution. The character of the officers, the honor of the denomination, and public opinion demanded prompt investigation. It was no secret within the denomination, although it was not much known beyond it, that in the management of the secular affairs of the Church there is a "Ring." This Ring holds the money and controls the press. Its power is necessarily enormous. It aspires to manage, if not to appoint, the very Bishops themselves. To their ears it was to sit by the fire. It was to summon it before the bar of public opinion, and to earn its relentless hatred. But the charges having been made, an investigation was unavoidable. It took place, and the result was a report that the egg was not very bad. Of course this only provoked a louder remark, and excited the very gravest suspicion that there was not only fraud, but a determination to conceal it. Unable to allay the discontent of the denomination, and the universal ridicule and denunciation of the press, there was another investigation committee. The result of this was a majority report that the egg was perfectly sound. No proof was offered, however, and the assertion was to be taken wholly upon the authority of those who had made it, and who had made a very different statement some weeks before.

But there was a minority report, sustained by ample evidence, declaring that the egg was very bad indeed, and that, even if the evidence as spurious, there could be no question of the fact. There was no attempt to validate the evidence; and there is probably no disinterested person in the country, who has read the documents, who is not satisfied that there have been gross frauds in the management of the Concern. Probably also no such person supposed that the officer who had exposed the delinquencies would be suffered to escape the vengeance of those who held that he had brought a scandal upon the denomination. Ecclesiastical hostility is unsparing. It may work in secret, but it does not sleep. Therefore, although it is some weeks since the conclusive exposure of the frauds in the minority report, it is only now that the blow of revenge has fallen.

The discovery of the frauds was made by DR. LANAHAN, the junior book agent. This agent is appointed for four years, and he may be removed for misconduct, after trial before the Book Committee and two Bishops, upon the consent of the Bishops and a majority of the Committee. Pending the trial the accused may be suspended; and four members of the Committee may call it together for action. This has been done, and among frauds such corruptionists of the Ring as WILLIAM M. EVARTS and OAKEY HALL cut down below its level the spiritual vote, etc., etc. Mr. CRAIGEN, the legislative orator of the "World's war" upon the Ring, appealed to the Senate not to continue "that system which has made the city of New York a disgrace to the country, and the by-word and laughing-stock of those who sneer at republican government . . . What a farce it is for us to sit here and legislate as representatives in a republican government when the election system upon which such a government rests has been undermined, and is as corrupt as hell!"

Certainly if there be any vital point in our political system it is the purity of the ballot-box. Upon that, all goes. The World claims to be the respectable paper. It knows where the corruption is, and who the corruptionists are. It might, therefore, be supposed that it would lend with extreme zeal and vigorous action to secure honest elections. But that supposition would be entertained only by those who had not seen the steady assistance which the World, by sneering at the suspicion of frauds, and by charging that the other party is as bad as it is, always gives to the Ring and its corruption at elections. The latest illustration of the sincerity of its desire to purify the ballot-box is its reception of Senator SHERMAN's proposition to defend the rights of the people at the polls. It is characteristic of the unhasty and decorous style of the paper that denounces "shameless corruptionists," and then zealously does their work.

"What does this howl about the necessity of Congress reconstructing the ballot-boxes of this city mean? Is it seriously meant that these follies and ignorances of the United States do not mean to lose their hold on the throats of the people? . . . . . is . . . . the ballot and stamp tools fell much as a heavy axe? Are they talk of putting the bayonet to New York. . . . The people of these United States have endured too much to endure Radicalism," etc. Certainly; they have endured from Radicalism the subjugation of a rebellion with the World's Christian sympathy and "great patience" as its head. They have endured from Radicalism the abolition of slavery, which the World's party tried to prevent and extend. They have endured from Radicalism the maintenance of the public faith and honor. They have endured from Radicalism the terrible severities exacted to the Presidency of the soldier who overcame the "Christian gentleman," and was therefore called by the World "a butcher." They have endured from Radicalism the salvation of their national life, and the elevation of their national name to an unprecedented glory. These things the people of the United States have endured from Radicalism, as they endured from that World and its party the support of the most infamous crimes against human nature, the utter disgrace of the national name, and the attempt and destruction of the Union and the government. We deny the right of an apologist for the slaveholder and the defeated and greatest soldiers to speak for the people of the United States.

PARLIAMENT AND WOMEN.

THE defeat of Mr. JACOB BRIGHT's bill in Parliament, extending the suffrage to a certain class of women, has been reported. It was lost by 120 majority, and the defeat was received with loud cheering. We suppose that nobody seriously anticipated any other result. A great political change is not made upon grounds of equity, nor even of probable public advantage; but only upon a strenuous demand. The rule in government is that all is right until a change is threateningly demanded. The reformer may prove, unchallenged, the injustice of the actual situation; but, until the injustice grinds so that there is an outcry, or an evident danger, nothing is likely to be done. Statesmen naturally plead that they have not been hurt up by political evils. When they become real, they say, it is time enough to deal with them. The duty of every reformer, therefore, who advocates a great a change as that involved in the demand for the equal political power of women, is to show that their exclusion is injurious to the public welfare. This must be done by a presentation of the actual, unjust inequalities of the law, and by moral considerations, which can not hope for any speedy influence upon affairs, but which gradually mould them by affecting public opinion.

Mr. GLADSTONE is reported as saying, merely, that there was no demand nor desire for the bill. He did not evidently think it worth while to enter upon the merits of the question, and did not say that the demand was in itself improper or unnatural. Indeed, his famous statement of the true limits of the elective franchise did not necessarily exclude women. What Mr. GLADSTONE now says, Mr. SUMNER has said in this country, and it is often put in a more positive form, namely: that when there is a general demand from women themselves, it will be granted. This is an immense concession; for it is a confession that there is no essential and incontrovertible reason against it. The subject, therefore, is especially the concern of women. To arouse their own sex and their legal friends' efforts must be directed, aided, as they will be, in this country and in England, by those of the present political class who believe their claim to be just and, therefore, expedient. Meanwhile the fact that the question has been submitted to the voters of Vermont, and has been seriously argued in Parliament, shows that it must now be considered a recognized political question.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

May 16.—In the Senate, the Georgia election bill and the Franking bill were passed over, after some discussion, for the purpose of taking up the bill for the enforcement of the Fifteenth Amendment, on which there was a long debate, but no action.——A large number of new bills were introduced in the House, among them one allowing women to be appointed notaries and marshals. A general amnesty bill was introduced by Mr. COX, and, after some discussion referred to the Reconstruction Committee. A bill enforcing the latent clause of the Fifteenth Amendment was also passed by a vote of 131 to 64, without debate.

May 17.—In the Senate, the whole day was occupied with the bill for enforcing the latent clause of the Fifteenth Amendment. The House discussed the bill to enforce the Fifteenth, but took no action.

May 18.—Scarcely any thing was done in the Senate. The two bills—House and Senate—to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment were discussed without action.——In the House, a bill was introduced and passed to allow discharged soldiers and sailors to enter quarter sections of land, now on a homestead basis, in the interests reserved sections along the line of railroads in Kansas.——Various works to which aid has been granted.

May 19.—In the Senate, a memorial from citizens of Rhode Island was presented, asking Congress to do away with the property qualification now binding upon naturalized citizens while voters, and abolishing any given of the proposed introduction of a bill upon this subject. Much the same day was occupied with debate on the Fifteenth Amendment bills.——In the House, a resolution was introduced by request for compelling Mexico to forfeit her treaty obligations. A whereas was passed, and also an amendment to the Judiciary Appropriation bill providing for the appointment of a Chief Justice in each of the Territories. It was also adopted.

May 20.—Beyond agreeing to adjourn on July 18, the Senate did nothing. The House passed the Senate Amendment bill.——In the House, the Senate resolution for fixing the time of final adjournment was concurred in. A bill was passed appropriating $100,000 from the Judiciary appropriation for the compensation of the officers and men of the Kearsarge for the capture of the Alabama. The amendment already received for bounties to be deducted.

May 21.—The Senate, after another fifteenth Amendment, after undergoing so many modifications as to be almost unrecognizable, was passed in the Senate by a vote of 40 to 8, in place of the House bill.——No business of public importance transacted in the House.

GENERAL NEWS ITEMS.

The election in this State on Tuesday, May 17, resulted in the triumph of the Democratic party, by about 30,000 majority.

CHAPTER III.

Description of the Band.—Abou Dra and Jali.—Charming fete.—Buffalo Killed by the Camp.—Roaring of the Lions.—Rout of the Elephants.—Appearance of an Old Hermit.—Difficult Approach.—Audacious Manœuvres of the Aggressors.—Sword Thrust.—Elephants in Sight.—Attack in the Jungle.—Seven Elephants Dead!—one Killed with the Sword.

THE band was complete. Besides our servants—the interpreter, a groom, two Arabs, and the woman who attended the cooking-pots and made the bread—I had nine camel drivers, six Tokrooris, a trackery named Taher Noor, and three aggageers, Abou Do, Jali, and Suleiman. Abou Do was a splendid-looking fellow, over six feet one, with a light, active figure, but exceedingly well developed muscles; his face was strikingly handsome: his eyes were like those of a giraffe, but the sudden glance of an eagle lighted them up with a flash during the excitement of conversation, which showed him of the gipsy-like Arab character. Jali was not above five feet four inches, but wonderfully muscular, and in expression a regular dare-devil.

Never was there more complete centaurs than these Hamran Arabs; the horse and man appeared to be one animal, and that of the most elastic nature, that could twist and turn with the suppleness of a snake. The feet of being on horseback had suddenly altered the character of these Arabs; from a sedate and proud bearing, they had become the wildest examples of the most savage disciples of Nimrod. Excited by enthusiasm, they shook their naked blades aloft till the steel trembled in their grasp, and away they dashed over rocks, through thorny bush, across ravines, up and down steep inclinations, engaging in a mimic hunt, and going through the various acts supposed to occur in the attack of a furious elephant. I must acknowledge that, in spite of my admiration for their wonderful dexterity, I began to doubt their prudence.

We ascended the Settite. The country was very beautiful, but so absolutely deserted that the sand on the river bank, which, like the snow, shows the slightest mark, did not bear the vestige of a human trave. Near the eastern bank, two days' march from Gria, an island had been formed of about three hundred acres: this was a perfect oasis of verdure, covered with large nabbuk-trees, thirty feet high, and forming a mixture of the densest coverts, with small open glades of rich but low herbage.

To reach this island, upon which we were to encamp, it was necessary to cross the arm of the river, that was now dry, with the exception of deep pools, in one of which we perceived a large bull buffalo drinking, just as we descended the hill. As this would be close to the larder, I stalked to within ninety yards, and fired into his back, as his head inclined to the water. For the moment he fell upon his knee, but recovering immediately, he rushed up the steep bank of the island, receiving my left-hand barrel between the shoulders, and he disappeared in the dense covert of green nabbuk on the margin. As we were to camp within a few yards of the spot, he was close to home. Having crossed the river, we carefully followed the blood-tracks through the jungle; but, after having pushed our way for about twenty paces through the dense covert, I came to the wise conclusion that it was not the place for following a wounded buffalo, and that we should find him dead on the next morning. A few yards upon our right hand was a beautiful open glade, commanding a view of the river, and surrounded by the largest nabbuk-trees, that afforded a delightful shade in the midst of the thick covert. This was a spot that in former years had been used by the aggageers as a camp, and we accordingly shouldered, and turned the horses to graze upon the welcome grass. Each horse was secured to a peg by a long halter-thong, as the liberty in this neighborhood were extremely dangerous, having the advantage of thick and open ground.

While the fires of our men were covered with strips of buffalo and veal meat, ours was garnished with a row of marrow-bones. The table was spread with a clean cloth and arranged for dinner. The cook, the cook, built stakes on a fire of glowing embers, slices of liver, well peppered with cayenne and salt, were grilling on the gridiron, and we were preparing to dine, when a terrific roar within a hundred and fifty yards informed us that a lion was also thinking of dinner. A confusion of tremendous roars proceeding from several lions followed the first sound, and most appalling quietly remarked, "There is no danger for the horses to-night, the lions have found your wounded buffalo!"

Such a magnificent chorus of bass voices I had never heard: the jungle cracked, as with repeated roars they dragged the carcass of the buffalo through the thorns to the spot where they intended to devour it. That which was music to our ears was discord to those of the interpreter and poor Banake. To reassure themselves, they relished the most horrible tales of death and destruction that had been wrought by lions: when suddenly the aggageers changed the conversation by a few notes of the Basé natives, which so thoroughly eclipsed the dangers of wild beasts, that in a short time the entire party would almost have welcomed a lion, provided he would only have agreed to protect them from the Basé. Early next morning I set out in search of these buffalo thieves. As I was returning from my fruitless quest, I met the aggageers, who had already made a reconnoissance in force, and having started before daybreak to look for elephants. They reported fresh tracks of a herd, later, a fine bull elephant marched majestically from the jungle upon the large area of sand, and proudly stalked direct toward the river.

At that time we were stationed under cover of a high bank of sand that had been left by the retiring river in sweeping round an angle: we immediately dismounted, and remained well concealed. The intention of attack was quickly settled; the elephant was quietly stalking toward the water, which was about three hundred paces distant from the jungle: this intervening space was heavy dry sand, that had been thrown up by the stream in the sudden bend of the river, which, turning from this point at a right angle, swept beneath a perpendicular cliff of conglomerate rock formed of rounded pebbles cemented together.

I proposed that we should endeavor to stalk the elephant, by creeping along the edge of the river, under cover of a sand-bank about three feet high, and that, should the rifles fail, the aggageers should come on at full gallop, and cut off his retreat from the jungle: we should then have a chance for the swords.

Accordingly I led the way, followed by Hadji and begged me to lose no time in accompanying Ali.

We were soon on the opposite bank. Tracking was very difficult, as there was a total absence of rain, it was next to impossible to distinguish the tracks of two days' date from those which were upon the hard and parched soil. The only positive clew was the fresh dung of the elephants; and this being deposited at long intervals rendered the search extremely tedious.

The greater part of the day passed in useless toil, and, after feeling the river backward and forward several times, we at length arrived at a large area of sand in the bend of the stream, that was evidently overflowed when the river was full; this surface of many acres was backed by a forest of large trees. Upon arrival at this spot, the aggageers, who appeared to know every inch of the country, declared that, unless the elephants had gone far away, they must be close at hand, within the forest. We were speculating upon the direction of the wind, when we were surprised by the sudden trumpet of an elephant, that proceeded from the forest: loudly declared to be the covert of the herd." In a few minutes Ali, my head Takroori, with a rifle, while I carried the "Baby." Florian accompanied us. Having the wind fair, we advanced quickly for about half the distance, at which time we were within a hundred and fifty yards of the elephant, who had just arrived at the water, and had commenced drinking. We now crept cautiously toward him; the sand-bank had decreased to a height of about two feet, and afforded very little shelter. Not a tree nor bush grew upon the surface of the barren sand, which was so deep that we sank nearly to the ankles at every footstep. Still we crept forward, as the elephant alternately drank, and then spouted the water in a shower over his colossal form; but just as we had arrived within about fifty yards, he happened to turn his head in our direction, and immediately perceived us. He cocked his enormous ears, gave a short trumpet, and for an instant he wavered in his determination whether to attack or fly; but as I rushed toward him with a shout, he turned toward the jungle, and I immediately fired a steady shot at the shoulder with the "Baby," my large rifle. As usual, the fearful recoil of the rifle, with a half-pound shell and twelve drachms of powder, nearly threw me backward; but I saw the mark upon the elephant's shoulder in an excellent line, although rather high. The only effect of the shot was to send him off at great speed toward the jungle; but at the same moment the three aggageers came galloping across the sand like greyhounds in a course, and judiciously keeping parallel with the jungle, they cut off his retreat, and turning toward the elephant, they confronted him, sword in hand. At once the monster bent charged straight at the enemy; but now came the very grilliant, but foolish, part of the hunt. Instead of leading the elephant by the flight of one mare on one horse, according to their usual method, all the aggageers at the same moment sprung from their saddles, and upon foot in the heavy sand they attacked the elephant with their swords.

In the way of sport I never saw any thing so magnificent, or so absurdly dangerous. The elephant was mad with rage, and nevertheless he seemed to know that the object of his fury was to get behind him. This he avoided with great dexterity, turning as it were upon a pivot with extreme quickness, and encountering headlong, first at one, and then at another of his assailants, while he blew clouds of sand in the air with his trunk and screamed with fury. Nimble as monkeys, nevertheless the aggageers could not get behind him. In the folly of excitement they had forsaken their horses, who had escaped from the spot. The depth of the loose sand was in favor of the elephant, and was so much against the men that they avoided his charges with extreme difficulty. It was only by the determined pluck of all three that they alternately saved each other, as two invariably dashed in at the flanks when the elephant charged the third, upon which the wary animal immediately relinquished the chase and turned round upon his pursuers. During this time I had been laboring through the heavy sand, and shortly after I arrived at the fight the elephant charged directly through the aggageers, receiving a shoulder-shot from one of my Reilly No. 10 rifles, and at the same time a slash from the sword of Abou Do, who, with great dexterity and speed, had closed in behind him, just in time to reach the leg. Unfortunately he could not deliver the cut in the right place, as the elephant, with increased speed, completely distanced the aggageers; he charged across the deep sand, and reached the jungle. We were shortly upon its tracks, and after running about a quarter of a mile he fell dead in a dry water-course.

Upon reaching the jungle by the river-side we again heard the trumpet of an elephant, and about a quarter of a mile distant we observed a herd of twelve of these animals shoulder-deep in the river, which they were in the act of crossing to the opposite side, to secure themselves in an almost impenetrable jungle of thorny sabbuk. I turn brought us to the edge of the jungle. We shortly heard a crackling on our right. I accordingly instructed Jali to creep quietly by himself into the bush, and to bring me information of their positions to this he at once agreed.

In three or four minutes he returned; he declared it impossible to use the sword, as the jungle was so dense that it would check the blow, but that I could use the rifle, as the elephants were close to us—who had seen three standing together between the bush and the main body of the herd. I told Jali to lead me direct to the spot, and followed by Florian and the aggeegers, with my gun-bearers, I kept within a foot of my dependable little guide, who crept gently into the jungle; this was intensely thick, and quite impenetrable, except in such places where elephants and other heavy animals had trodden numerous alleys. Along one of these narrow passages we stealthily advanced, until Jali suddenly quietly put on one side, and pointed with his finger. I immediately observed two elephants looming through the thick bushes about eight paces from me. One offered a temple shot, which I quickly took with a Reilly No. 10, and floored it on the spot. The smoke hung so thickly that I could not see sufficiently distinctly to fire a second shot before the remaining elephant had turned; but Florian, with a three-ounce, steel-tipped bullet, by a cautious shot at the shoulder, penetrated to the lap joint to such an extent that we could more than equal the elephant in speed. At this moment we found ourselves in a small open glade in the middle of the jungle, close to the stern of the elephant we were following. I had taken a fresh rifle, with both barrels loaded, and hardly had I made the exchange, when the elephant turned suddenly and charged. Determined to try fairly the forehead shot, I kept my ground, and fired a Reilly No. 10, quicksilver and ball, which, exactly in the centre, when certainly within four yards. The only effect was to make her stagger backward, when, in another moment, with her immense ears thrown forward, she again rushed innocent. This was touch-and-go; but I fired my remaining barrel a little lower than the first shot. Crazed in her rush, she backed toward the dense jungle, throwing her trunk about and trumpeting with rage. Snatching the Cyclops (No. 10 from one of my trusty Tokroonis (Hassan), I ran straight at her, took a most deliberate aim at the forehead, and once more fired. The only effect was a decisive charge; but before I fired my last barrel Juli rushed in, and with one blow of his sharp sword severed the back sinew. She was utterly helpless in the same instant. Behind her I had fired three beautiful correct shots with No. 10 bullets, and seven drachms of powder in each cartridge; but there is no nearly vulnerable spot they occupied a space in her forehead of about three inches, and all had failed to kill! There could no longer be any doubt that the forehead shot at an African elephant could not be relied upon, although a shot to the brain was sure. This increased the danger tenfold, as in Ceylon I had generally made certain of an elephant by steadily waiting until it was close upon me.

I now reloaded my rifles, and the aggressors spitted the jungle; to remount their horses, or they expected the herd had broken cover on the other side of the jungle; in which case they intended to give chase, and, if possible, to turn them back into the covert, and drive them toward the guns. The surprisingly took our stand in the small open glade, and I lent Florian one of my double rifles, as he was only provided with one single-barreled elephant gun. I did not wish to destroy the prestige of the rifle that I intended for aggressors that I would be rather awkward for us to receive the charge of the infuriated herd, as the females were considerable. I was not heavily I rather hoped that they would not come in direct upon our position as the aggressors would.

About a quarter of an hour passed in suspense, when we suddenly heard a chorus of wild cries of excitement on the other side of the jungle, raised by the aggressors who had headed the herd, and who were driving them back toward us.

In a few minutes a tremendous crashing in the jungle, accompanied by the occasional shrill scream of a terror-stricken elephant, and frequent shouts of the mounted aggressors, assured us that they were bearing down exactly upon our direction: they were apparently following a path through the dense jungle by the wild and reckless Arabs. I called my men (four together, and told them to stand first, and hand me the guns quickly; and we eagerly awaited the onset that rushed toward us like a storm. On they came, seeing every thing before them. For a moment the jungle parted and crushed; and a cow elephant, headed by an immense elephant, the herd thundered down upon us. The great leader came direct at me, as we received him with shot and left in the forehead from a Reilly No. 10 as fast as I could pull the trigger. The shots struck it real backward for an instant, and fortunately turned it, and the herd likewise. My second rifle was beautifully handled, and I gave it quick right and left at the temples of two fine elephants, dropping them on the stone-dead. At this moment the "Baby" was pushed into my hand by Hadji Ali just in time to take the shoulder of the last of the herd, who had already charged completely after his comrades, and was disappearing in the jungle. Bang went the "Baby;" the beast gave like a weather-cock, with the blood pouring from my nose, as the recoil had driven the sharp top of the hammer into the bridge. The "Baby" had not only screamed, but kicked viciously. However, I knew that the elephant was dead; and as the half-pound shell had been aimed directly behind the shoulder.

In a few minutes the aggaeers arrived; they were bleeding from countless scratches. About Ibn had thrown his sword. They said that when the elephants commencing a retreat to the interior of the country, and they had arrived just in time to turn them. Following them at full speed, Abou Do had succeeded in overtaking and slashing the tuner of an elephant just as it was entering the jungle.

We had done pretty well. I had been fortunate in bagging four from this herd, in addition to the single bull in the morning; total, five. Florian had killed two, and the aggaeers one; total, seven elephants. One had escaped that I had wounded in the shoulder, and two that had been wounded by Florian. I was sorry to pursue them, but the aggaeers determined to search for the wounded elephants on the following day.

CHAPTER IV.

Search for the Wounded.—Fall of Juli.—The four Sheriff Brothers.—One-armed Ibn Mahomet.—Their Tracks, but no Elephants.—Idling.—A couple of Rhinoceroses.—Chase and Pursuit.—Juli's Revenge.—Rivalry.—Despair of Abou Do.—Last Effort.—Victory reappears.—The Rhinoceros at Bay.—Charge.—Snare laid for him.

Once of the three wounded elephants had returned to the thick jungle, where my aggaeers found themselves free to face with him. As escape was now impossible, Juli determined to share sharp round, and she bounded off, but caught in the thorns and fell, throwing her rider under the feet of the elephant. The poor animal reared herself in an instant, and rushed away: the elephant, urged by the wish to revenge his master, neglected the man, upon whom he trod in the pursuit, thus breaking his thigh.

Shortly after the Sheriff brothers, having learned of the results of our expedition, came to ask to join our party. There were four of them, the most renowned of all the aggaeers. Even Abou Do, though a perfect coward in sport, felt himself inferior to the eldest of these magnificent hunters; and, seized with a fit of jealousy, he declared that if I accepted these new allies he would leave, taking Suleiman with him. I decided, however, to keep the Sheriffs till the arrival of the new huntsman who was to take Juli's place, to which Abou Do made no further objection.

The second of the brothers, Rodur, had lost the use of one arm. An elephant one day, after killing his horse, had ripped open his arm with a tusk. The bone, crushed from the elbow to the wrist, came out in pieces, and the flesh looked like a mass of shriveled leather, with a withered hand at the end, resembling a vulture's claw, which mostly served to clutch the bridle. Rodur was, nevertheless, the most renowned of his tribe as a leader of the chase.

At daybreak on the following morning, we set out early in the morning. Fresh tracks were numerous on the water's edge, but not one of an elephant. We therefore struck inland, and idled about, knocking down the ripe fruit of the baobab, and stripping from the trees the bark, from which they were covered, and which, hard as ice on the exterior, turned in the mouth, resembling melted amber, called to mind the trees covered with jewels in the gardens of the "Arabian Nights." The aggaeers took off from their saddles the skins of tanned antelope leather that formed the only coverings to the wooden seats, and with these they made bundles of gum. When we remounted, every man was well laden.

We were thus leisurely returning home through alternate plains and low open forest of mimosa, when Ibrahim, who was leading the party, suddenly reined up his horse, and pointed to a thick bush beneath which was a large gray, but indistinct object. Every aggaeer instantly drew, and advanced as near as I could, followed by Suleiman. As I drew nearer, I discovered a rhinoceros asleep beneath a thick mass of bushes; the were lying like pigs, close together. I told Suleiman to inform the aggaeers, that I would reserve in reniness with his own. I then walked quietly to within about thirty yards of the rhinoceros, but could scarcely see any thing that was useless to attempt a shot. In their happy dreamland they had not been disturbed, but startled by the scent of an enemy, for, without the least warning, they suddenly sprang to their feet with astonishing activity, and, with a loud and sharp whiff, whiff, whiff! one of them charged straight at me. I could not see whether it was the female, as it was useless to aim at the head protected by two horns at the nose. This turned him, but he came on again, and the animals thundered off together at a tremendous pace.

Mounting my horse, the word "Yallah!" given and was scattered on the ground, and away went the aggaeers in full speed after the two rhinoceros, without waiting to reload. I quickly remounted my horse, and spurred hard to overtake the flying Arabs. I could see no rhinoceros in front, but at full speed, as it was an open forest of mimosas, which, although wide apart, were very difficult to avoid, owing to the low overhanging and spiny branches: these, being armed with fishhook thorns, were terrible. Every moment I expected I kept the party in view, until lo about a mile we arrived upon open ground. Here I again caught sight of them, and forgave I could not always gaining, until I at length joined the aggaeers.

Here was a sight to drive a hunter wild! The two rhinoceros were running neck and neck, like a pair of horses in harness. Immediately before them stood a tremendous speed within ten yards of Taher Sheriff, who, with his sword drawn, and his long spear in his wildly behind him, urged his horse forward in the race, amidst a cloud of dust raised by the two rhinoceros and by the horses of every sinew of the horses. Rodur Sheriff, with the withered arm, was second, with the reins upon the horse's neck like a bow that was all that remained of a hand, but, with his naked sword grasped in his fist, he kept close to Taher Sheriff, ready to second his blow. Abou Do was third; his hair flying in the wind—his heels dashing against the flanks of his horse. Juli had distanced in his excitement to urge him to the race, and he leaned forward with his long sword, in the wild energy of the moment, as though hoping to reach the game against all possibility. Now for the end! Taher Sheriff, vigorously applied, served an extra stride out of his horse's power, and, with a fierce cry of open, horse, and drawn swords. Passing Abou Do, whose face wore an expression of agony at finding that his horse was failing, Taher Sheriff raised a place between the two brothers, Taher and Rodur Sheriff. There was a fierce struggle between the two parties of aggaeers, and each was striving to outdo the other; thus Abou Do was driven almost to madness by the successful race of Taher's horse, while the latter, who was the renowned leader of the tribe, was overjoyed. But his sword should be the first to taste blood. I tried to pass the rhinoceros on my left, so as to be close into the aggaeers, but succeeded in but with my right hand, but it was impossible to overtake the rhinoceros, as they were going at undiminished speed. With the greatest exertion of man and horses we could only retain our position within about three or four hundred feet of the tails—just out of reach of the swords. The only chance in the race was that the pace could not rhinoceros should begin to flag. The horses were pressed to the utmost; but we had already run about ten miles, and they showed decided signs of giving in. On they flew—sometimes over ant-hills, and sometimes in holes, which tried the horses severely; then through strips of open forest, until at length the party began to tail off, and only a select few kept their places. We arrived at the summit of a ridge, from which the ground sloped away for three hundred yards to a mile toward the river; at the foot of this incline was thick thorny nabbok jungle, for which immediately ascent the rhinoceros made at their utmost speed. Never was there better ground for the finish of a race: the earth was perfect, but firm, and as we saw the winning post in the jungle that must terminate the lists, we redoubled our exertions to close with the unflagging game. Suleiman's horse gave in—we had been for about twenty minutes at a killing pace. Tetel, although not a fast horse, was good for a distance, and he now proved his power of endurance, as I was riding at least two stone heavier than any of the party. Only four of the seven remained; and we swept down the incline. Taher Sheriff still leading, and Abou Do the last: His horse was done, but not the jaded. Juli, spitting on the ground while at full speed, sword in hand, he forsook his tired horse, and, preferring his own legs, he ran like an antelope, and, for the first hundred yards, I thought he would really pass us, and win the honor of first blood. But no one was, the poor ass too severe, and, although running wonderfully, he was obliged to give way to the horses. The game now followed the rhinoceros—Taher Sheriff, his leather blodur, and myself. I had been obliged to give the reins of Tetel to Rodur, as he was a mere monkey in weight; but I was a close third. The excitement was extreme—we neared the jungle, and the rhinoceros began to show signs of flagging, as the dust puffed up before their nostrils, and, as we rose to the ground, they snorted as they still galloped on. Oh, for a fresh horse! I shouted. "Rodur! a fresh horse!" We were within two hundred yards of the jungle; but the horses were all done. Tetel reined in as I spurred forward, Rodur pushed ahead; we were close to the dense thorns, and the rhinoceros began to trot; they were done too. "Now, Taher, for-a-n-r-r-d! for-r-r-a-s-r-d, Taher!!!" Away he went—he was close to the very back of the beast, but his lance could be no more than his present pace; still he gained upon the rhinoceros, and, with a sward with his sword, raised for the blow—another moment, and the jungle would be reached! One effort more, and the sword fell in the sunshine as the rearmost rhinoceros disappeared in the thick jungle with a bang. A gush about a foot long upon his hind-quarters. Taher Sheriff shook his bloody sword in triumph above his head; but the rhinoceros was gone. We were fairly beaten, regularly outpaced; but I believe neither two hundred yards more could have given the victory.

"Bravo, Taher!" I shouted. He had ridden splendidly, and his blow had been marvelously delivered at an extremely long reach, as he was nearly out of his saddle when he sprung forward to enable the blade to attain a cut at the rhinoceros. He could not reach the hamstring, as his horse could not gain the proper position.

We all immediately dismounted; the horses were thoroughly done, and I at once loosened Tetel's girths and removed his wet sheet! Tetel, with head lowered and legs wide apart, was a most favorable object for the sword cut. The other aggaeers shortly arrived, and as the rival Abou Do joined us, Taher Sheriff quietly wiped his sword on the grass without making a remark; this was a bitter moment for the discomfited Abou Do.

Although we had failed, I never enjoyed a hunt so much either before or since; it was a splendid contest, and still more magnificent was the idea that a man, with no weapon but the sword, should attack and generally vanquish every huge animal of creation.

Taher Sheriff explained that at all times the rhinoceros was the most difficult animal to attack, on account of his extraordinary swiftness, and although he had killed many with the sword, it was by the use of a long and fatiguing hunt; at the close of which, the animal becoming tired, generally turned at bay, in which case one hunter occupied his attention, while another galloped up behind, and severed the hamstring. The rhinoceros, deprived of his support, can go very well upon three legs, which enhances the danger, as he can still use his horn with effect.

There is only one species of this animal in Abyssinia; this is the two-horned black rhinoceros, which is found in Africa to the Indies. This animal is generally five six inches to five feet eight inches high at the shoulder, and, although so bulky and heavily built, it is extremely active, as our long and fruitless hunt had proved. The head of this two-horned black species is exceedingly vicious; it is one of the very few animals that will generally attack unprovoked, as it considers all creatures to be enemies, and, although it is not acute in either sight or hearing, it possesses an extraordinary power of scent that will detect a stranger at a distance of five or six hundred yards with the wind far forewards.

I have observed that a rhinoceros will generally charge down upon the object that it smells, and does not see, if the latter be the animal is concealed either in high grass or thick jungle, should it scent a man who may be passing unseen to the leeward, it will turn down furiously upon the object is has winded, with three loud whiffs, resembling a fit of sneezing. The charge of this is most difficult and next to impossible to kill a rhinoceros when charging on account of the protection to the head afforded by the horns, an unexpected charge in thick jungle is particularly unpleasant, as they come on like a locomotive. These animals are generally seen in pairs, or the male, female, and calf; the mother is very affectionate, and, although very watchful and savage. Although so large an animal, the cry is very insignificant, and is more like the bark of a dog, or sound of a penny trumpet. The drinking hour is about 8 P.M., or two hours after sunset, at which time the rhinoceros arrives at the river from his daily retreat, which is usually about four miles in a direct line. He approaches the water by regular paths made by himself, but not always by the same route; and, after drinking, he generally retires to a particular spot beneath a tree that has been visited upon regular occasions: in such a path the earth was worn by the mulate. The hunters take advantage of this peculiarity of the rhinoceros, and they set traps in the path to his private retreat: but he is so extremely wary, and so acute is the animal's power of scent, that the greatest art is necessary in setting the snare. A circular hole about two feet deep and fifteen inches in diameter is dug in the middle of his run, near the tree that has been daily visited; upon this hole is placed a hoop of tough wood arranged with a running noose and sharp spikes of a strong elastic wood, which, fastened to the rim, meet at the centre, and overlap each other as would the spokes of a wheel in the absence of the nave, if lengthened sufficiently. We will suppose the hoop to be fixed to a wheel without a centre, the spokes sharpened and overlapping in the middle. The instrument being fitted nearly above the hole, a running noose of the strongest rope is laid in a circle upon the hoop. The other extremity of the rope is fastened to the trunk of a tree that has been felled for that purpose, and deeply notched at one end to prevent the rope from slipping. This log, which weighs about five or six hundred-weight, is then hurled backward by the ground, and the entire trap is covered with earth and carefully concealed; the surface is smoothed with a branch instead of the hand, as the scent of a human touch would at once be detected by the rhinoceros. When completed, a portion of the animal's dung is swept from the heap upon the snare. If the trap is successfully constructed, the rhinoceros steps upon the hoop, through which his leg sinks into the hole, and upon his attempt to extricate it, the loose noose draws tight over the legs; as the spoked hoop fixing tightly into the skin prevents the noose from slipping over the foot. Once caught, his first effort to escape drags the heavy log from the trench, and as the animal hurries forward, away, this acts as a drag, and, by catching in the jungle and the protruding roots of trees, it quickly fatigues him. On the following morning the hunters discover the rhinoceros by the track of the log that has plowed through the earth, and the animal is killed by lances, or by the sword.

"DEAD BROKE."

"He is dead broke."

"How much does he owe?"

"One week, to-morrow, over the month," said the clerk, examining the ledger.

"Whew!" whistled the landlord. "Has he no friends to pay for him?"

"Friends now," Sands new, but let them find out that he is broke and they'll be off like a covey of birds."

"I must see him;" and the hotel proprietor, walking out upon the piazza, approached a young man leaning against one of the front pillars.

"Mr. Watson, your bill, I see, is in arrears for one week over the month. Can I call it?"

The young man flushed at first as if in anger; then a smile overspread his handsome face. "I will, mine host, Major Snow, but I can't pay at present."

"Do you expect money soon?"

"Well, really, I don't know who should send me any thing from their surfeit of cash."

"Then I am to understand that you are not only unable to pay, but do not expect to be able?"

"Undoubtedly, Major."

"Sorry, Watson, for you have been a favorite of the season, and I don't like to turn you out before the break-up. Nor will I, if you can give up your suit of rooms and take up with one suited to your circumstances, I will let you remain the season out, trusting you to pay me in the future."

"You are very good, Major, and I guess I'll have to consent."

So the luggage of Robert Watson was lifted and lugged down the elegant stairs to the second-floor to a little seven by fourteen room on the fifth-floor.

Society quickly it became known that the change had been made! Every servant in the house conveyed the information to the inmates of the usual deference paid to the possessors of "parlors." At dinner, the cry, "boy," with the usual eagerness to anticipate Mr. Watson's wants, suddenly became oblivious to those wants, and only answered them after repeated calls. The cashier and register clerk, always so obsequious, grew dignified and indifferent. Only the whole page received with a kindly greeting for the guest too poor to pay his bill, and remaining by sufferance.

"Queer," thought the hotel proprietor. "He certainly had money enough when he came, for he deposited a good five hundred in the safe. He hasn't been fast, I am certain, and his habits have been so good that the young fellow has rather played off from him. But he has been a favorite. Not a belle in the room but would have dropped her best friend for his acquaintance. Hang me if I can understand it."

Watson, the handsome, fashionable, had been a season guest at the Cascade. Friends he had in plenty. He was courteous, well-bred, good-looking, intelligent, and, apparently, rich—what more could be asked? Among the ladies he had singled out a favorite; and among the men he commoved quite a prince; and among the gentlemen neither was he loth to capture him, but to all he proved a very incorrigible recreant—he would not be drawn into one's prize. Exquisite charm of voice, manner, and sentiment, the beauty of person, the perfection of attire—all were agreeable to him, deeply so, for he seemed to enjoy them all immensely; but not the brilliant Louise Miles Percy, nor the rich Miss Ormsmore, appeared to command him. He was to all alike, the most agreeable companion, the most considerate friend, the shrewd assistant of all arts to lead him into love's labyrinthine mazes.

How would all these beauties of the salon receive the announcement sure to be made of his "altered circumstances," as the Major expressed it?

Evidently Mr. Watson was not indifferent. He still frequented the piazzas and parlors, giving every friend, male or female, ample opportunity to "cut" his acquaintance, or otherwise to express themselves. It was somewhat curious to see the symptoms of his decline, not the less for Watson had that in his character construction which, even in poverty and trial, would preserve him from a sacrifice of personal dignity and self-reliance. But that he was on the decline became to him a sorrowful fact.

Sorrowful, did we say? That is, judging by the usual standards of human felicity or misery. To lose one's friends, to behold your position in society gradually slipping away, to realize that no longer you are held in coveted consideration by a chosen few, is, ordinarily, a source of sorrow. But in Watson's case it was difficult to determine how keenly the knife cut to the quick of his sensibilities: for, while every acquaintance was given full facilities for doing the slaughtering blow after giving the "cold shoulder," the Baltimorean appeared like an interested spectator, and was a mourned, when passed by a supposed friend without the slightest notice, as if he were a newspaper reporter, anxious to see the act and to note the fact.

Into the parlors during the evening he particularly patronized his way. If a bevy of gay fellows surrounded Miss Mountjoy, he worked his way to the circle, and, at last, received from that lady of sorghum the full benefit of her battery. He most gracefully and crushingly turn her back upon him but three days after he removed from the second floor.

Miss Damnin he sought, confident that one so artless could not be above the level of the fashionable crowd, and still give him her kindly greeting. With consequent ill. The artless girl was puzzled, and when at length he cornered her, it was to his discomfiture. She suddenly turned and forced her way past him, without even a nod or the downcast glances. On the contrary, her eyes were fixed fully on his face, and plainly said, "Sir, we are strangers."

Next he tried rattle-headed Miss Lumbert, and she actually spoke to him! But Watson soon discovered that the rattle was not for him.

Strangely enough, the proud and exclusive Miss Percy awakened no emotion from her every rage, and gave him a welcome; but over it all was a shadow. Once, apparently, he thought Miss Percy shy rather than haughty; and Watson began to catch glimpses of a character beneath all her conventional veil which he had not expected to find.

Of course wealthy Miss Orromans would scorn his further friendly relations. Her rooms were near his own second-floor apartments; she daily, all the year, had encountered him in the walks through the long corridor, and must have seen one of the two to learn of his fallen fortunes. Indeed, he half surmised that her dressing-maid had made special inquiry into his case, seeing her in confidential conclave with the housekeeper and room-girls. So Watson, with a reserve or pride not entertained with others, kept apart from Miss Orromans.

On that third evening of his changed fortunes, when the Sappho of the Cascades unbuttoned him, greatly to the pleasure of the young "bloods" around her, Watson wandered away at length upon the piazzas; then up through the long, deserted halls, restless, thoughtful, digesting the notes which he had been taking of human nature, and trying to fix the relative value of a man without money. It was the crystalline truth he was learning—not the truth in mere solution, sometimes clear, sometimes opaque, but always thin, but the precipitated, hard, angular, clear-cut crystals of experience, mined in unexpected places. Had he remained upon the second-floor, never would he have obtained that power; the more solution only would have repaid his keenest search. But his migration to the upper rooms had given him a wondrous lens; his horizon was so immeasurably extended that, barring the fact that his life was ruined, he was daily finding an easier wiser for upward reverses.

Suddenly, in his solitary promenade, he confronted the heiress. She was walking arm in arm with young Evans, of her "set," in confidential conversation it would appear, as she only should they have been in that long hall alone; indeed Watson, as with a glance, felt that was the situation. The meeting was a surprise to both parties, and the inclination of both men was to pass without recognition. Evans, however, paused; Watson flushed in anger, and with head erect bore down and passed the heiress, who suspended or cashiered officer of the line, conscious of his solidarity qualities, but equally conscious of his "altered circumstances."

Too high he held his head, in fact, for he caught no soft glance from the lady's eyes, and stood so firmly upon the trial of her elegant evening dress as to cause a perceptible cracking of seams at the skirt gores. Evans turned with a sudden anger.

"Dolt!" he hissed.

Watson paused on, staying to make no apology, but he heard the lady say:

"Fie, it is nothing;" and he was conscious, too, that she was looking at him wondering.

An hour later Watson was down on the piazzas again, evidently on the quest for some person, and he found his man ere long. Evans was the gentleman wanted. Going up to him Watson said:

"Mr. Evans, what was the word you used at the time I trod on the trail of Miss Orromans's dress?"

"I said dolt, Sir! and I say it again. We have hitherto supposed you to be a gentleman, and now learn that you can not pay your bills; and he laughed, half in scorn and half in humor of the fact so opportunely given him to crush another.

The hot blood flew to Watson's face; his hands were clenched as if to strike; but, by a strong effort, he mastered his passion.

"Evans, no gentleman ever would have uttered that sentence. Only a coward would thing another's poverty in his face. Miss Orromans, educated as she has been to give virtue to wealth, might find in my inability to pay my hotel bill a justification for dropping my acquaintance; but I doubt if ever she would have experienced incivility. I owe her an apology for my seeming rudeness, and will give it to her now if you will in too supreme contempt even to exchange more words with you. Hereafter do not speak to me, Sir, nor look me in the face, save one in the presence of the ladies." And the speaker went his way to his attic room.

This scene, overheard by several gentlemen and ladies, soon was the talk of the rooms. Watson, being a gentleman of a very ultra-secretative circle, soon convened others of the set; and Major Snow was, ere long, summoned to be informed that he must "clear out Watson" Evans offering to pay the delinquent's bill.

And the news flew throughout the parlors and promenades that Major Snow was to give Mr. Robert Watson, of Baltimore, his walking papers in the morning.

An observer of the scene between the two gentlemen at the door of Miss Orromans's parlor, failing at once retired to her room to repair the accident to her skirt, she hardly deemed another of sufficient importance to be recorded, stole out upon the pleasant open weather promenade. She thus was a witness of what transpired. She, then, retired, in evident excitement, to her rooms; and when her maid, half an hour later, brought the startling news that the Major was to clear Watson out in the morning, the heiress, with perfect dissimulation, met with blushing cheek in her cheeks, and a clear sparkle in her beautiful eyes, sat down to her desk and indited the following note:

"MAJOR SNOW will please take no action in the matter of the difficulty between Mr. WATSON and Mr. EVANS. I cordially regret that the affair has occurred, and sympathize with Mr. WATSON in his misfortune. But it is not an insult to him, I would offer to become reconciled to him myself, and will do so if he is not able to pay; but I know that he is a thorough gentleman, and therefore very sorry I am compelled by you or to leave your house at the dictation of others.

"Yours, &c.,

"HELENE ORROMANS."

This the maid was instructed to deliver in the Major's hands at once. The maid had not far to go, for she met the proprietor advancing up the corridor. He glanced at the note, and laughed; then paused and said:

"Give it to me." Up he went pair of stairs. Mr. Robert Watson has the freedom of this house for the next five seasons.

Major Snow came to see again; while the open-eared maid, having lost not a word, returned to her mistress to find the heiress in a gunning-out-of-note. This was written with great care and many pauses. It was finally finished, and sealed as follows:

"Mr. Watson will please excuse the boldness of this note. He has never been a witness of my weakness. I esteem yourself and Mr. Evans on the piazza. I feel it my duty to inform you that I heartily pity your unfeeling and your words. I ask no apology from you. Indeed, I shall be pained to receive it. Believe me, I am exceedingly pained at the inference you have drawn, namely, that I could find a satisfaction in dropping your acquaintance in the fact of your temporary embarrassment. Also for my own part I shall compel me to hear such impertinence on my sense and modest ear.

"HELENE ORROMANS."

This missive the maid took to Watson's story. It found the romantic Robert in bed; but the letter was flung in over the door vestibule.

"Tell Miss Orromans that I thank her kindly," said a voice at the door; and Watson sprang up as the envelope dropped down to the floor.

"A note from my lady?" What on earth did that mean? A another rumpus brewing, of course! Another duel, and this time Watson killed? Watson, delighted, as the rich color mounting to his temples testified. And then, foolish man, he kissed the missive.

So very preposterous for one in his circumstances!

Many were the guests who "turned out" fully two hours before dawn on the day of the duel, and many the conversing, in order to see Mr. Robert Watson depart. To their surprise there was no Watson. Instead, Major Snow ascending and descending the back stairs, arm in arm with Miss Orromans, and Major Snow bowing to admiring friends. Evans was his set it was a declaration of war: but who would dare take up arms against the heiress' champion? Not Evans, for he all retired, resolved to let events take their course.

And they did take their course, of course. In three days' time a magnificent equipage drove to the door of Miss Orromans's mansion, and the beautiful Miss Orromans for his companion in the morning drive.

"Whose carriage is that?" demanded Evans of the Major, who had escorted his guests to the carriage.

"Oh, that's Watson's, to be sure!" was the reply.

"Watson's be hanged! Say, Major, has he paid his bill?" asked Evans, maliciously.

"Lord bless you! I don't know, but he is rich enough to buy out this whole concern, and to hire you and me for cell boys!"

"Explain yourself, then, Sir!" demanded Evans, irately. "Did you not inform the guests that he could not pay his bill, and that he had sent him up stairs out of his second-floor suit?

"Not I! Some of the clerks may have said something, to which others added more; but I really thought too much of the gentleman to mention the matter to any one. Now it turns out that it was all a little game of his own."

"Little game? What object could he have had in playing such hide and seek?" demanded Evans again, in tones peremptory.

"Well, in part, I suppose, to test the value of friendship in general, and the power of money in particular—both of which I have no doubt he has done to his entire satisfaction. Ha-ha-ha What do you think about it, Mr. Evans?"

"Think about it? Why, that it was—it was—"

"What?"

"Why, a very artful dodge—nothing less."

"Capital dodge, that's a fact, seeing that, as a poor man, he was left by Miss Orromans, and—"

"Now, what do you mean?" fairly shouted Evans, in his excitement.

"Mean? I mean that 10 o'clock on the morning of the day when he was to have had his walking papers, the order, he was dead in love with the heiress, and—"

"And what, Sir?"

"And he dead in love with him!"

"It's false, I know!" cried the man, now white in the face from some inexplicable emotion.

"False, eh? Going off in that carriage together to the preacher's looks like it, don't it?"

"Good Heavens!"

The Major's conjecture was prematurе, as he well knew; but the shaft had struck Evans in the heart, and he fairly staggered to a seat. Major Snow had given a deep and deep game to win the heiress. He had long been her recognized suitor—he had discounted her possessions in his bright future—but he could wait—he was dead broke!

He left the watering-place that day.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

WHEN breathing the impure and oppressive air of some crowded church, or hall, or concert-room, we have often wished it were possible for one to carry with him, as he does his spectacles or opera-glass, a personal supply of oxygen for the comfort and support of the lungs. Such a gift in time may yet come when it will be quite the fashion to carry about a little India rubber bag filled with the gas which the lungs in certain instances may require. Within a few years the use of oxygen has been revived for medicinal purposes. Experiments have been tried showing that a man can breathe the pure gas with great benefit in certain conditions of the body. In cases of consumption it has been found to assist nutrition and respiration; even when the disease has already diseased, life is sometimes prolonged beyond all hopes of friends and physicians. In cases of diphtheria, fevers, and many other diseases involving difficult respiration, great relief is often experienced from oxygen gas. Indeed, it is suspecting how many difficulties, which have refused to yield to other remedies, may be overcome at once by this article. Although the use of oxygen medicinally is still a novelty, the demand for it has recently increased so much that it has been found worth while to utilize breathing apparatus are furnished by apothecaries, and the gas is confined in portable iron cylinders of various sizes and dispensed like other medicines. A simple apparatus has been devised for manufacturing it as it is needed.

There is to be an outdoor department, at which patients residing at their own homes can attend and receive gratuitous medical treatment.

In a recent report of the Paris prison-reform commissioners unanimously adopted, which warmly sympathized with Mrs. Elizabeth Richardson and her associates, they have also aided and supported her. The following resolution was also carried with enthusiasm:

Resolved, That we reprobate any expression that tends to convey the idea of ownership in marriage, we distinctly recognize it, as a holy and Godordained institution, based upon the equal interests, equal affections, and equal rights of the contracting parties; and that the recent change in the marriage service of the Methodist Episcopal Church, substituting for the word "obey" the words "you mutually agree," is a step toward the more enlightened spirit of the age, which is tending to equal justice in human relations.

A farmer in England has committed suicide in a fit of mental aberration, caused by his crops having been destroyed by excessive rains. Many of the fields have been overrun with them for years past, and he has sometimes cleared about 15 in a week. He could obtain no relief, and, seeing nothing but ruin in the future, he put an utter end to his existence. Many of the rabbits have conquered, and the man has retired from the field of battle.

A Louisville man is rendering himself notable, or notorious, by a strange method of which each house he robs is known. He is a burglar, for he breaks into houses by night; but he steals nothing, except a few articles of wearing apparel. He goes at some person who is sleeping, and watching him or her, as the case may be, with a dark lantern, has entered the room of a young lady after she had retired and gone to sleep. Taking his favorite position beside the bed, he stood gazing at the beautiful sleeper till, perhaps, conscious of his presence and evil intent, she awoke and screamed for help. By the faint light of the moon she saw this strange standing motionless at her bedside. The stranger standing motionless at her bedside. The screams awakened the family, and the inmates of the house came rushing in just in time to catch the intruder. They seized on little gossip as the result, but subsequent facts have proved that the man was harmless, having no design to disturb any thing or any body.

The London Art Journal gives a very interesting and commendatory account of certain lady artists from America, whose studies are located in Florence. Miss Hosmer is still at work on the statue of the ex-Queen of Naples, which was the first that is positively conceded from the public eye. Not even the Empress Eugenie, the Queen's own sister, has been permitted to see it; but now it is nearly ready for exhibition. Miss Hosmer is also engaged in modeling the beautiful medallions representing the twelve hours of the day, which are to decorate the dial of a clock which she has designed for Earl Brownlow. The door is intended for a drawing-room opening into the library, and every medallion is a treasure of art. Miss Foley has in hand the bust of the Pope, which is considered the most successful work of the Hebrew. Miss Foley has acquired an enviable reputation for her beautifully finished medallions. Vinnie Reins is making a few alterations in the model of Lincoln before she begins the execution of it in marble. Father Hyacinthe gave three sittings to Miss Ream just before he came to America: and she has also modeled a bust of Gustave Doré. She is also at work executing a Madonna for the Church of St. Francis, in Baltimore; and also is designing a monument to be erected in Montalban, Massachusetts.

Science has conquered nature in the establishment of a singular society in Paris, consisting at present of more than a hundred members. So great is the desire of these individuals to aid science after death, that they have pledged themselves not to be buried after death, but to bequeath their bodies for dissection!

A Connecticut minister, in a time of drought, prayed for rain in a more specific way than is customary. He prayed that a copious shower that would carry away the bridges, but for a drizzle-drozzle, that would last a week.

William Cullen Bryant recently delivered an address before the New York Historical Society, on the "Life, Character, and Writings of Gulian C. Verplanck." In the course of the address many extracts were read from letters written by Mr. Verplanck many years ago, while in Europe. The following anecdotes was related in one of these letters:

"You may expect another explosion of mad poetry from Coleridge and Lord Byron. Coleridge, who has become a few days ago, told Mr. Gallatin that he was the author of Junius's letters. He has also written a book against Hume, which, however, is not generally known. That you may have a higher relish for the joke, I will tell you a little anecdote which he told in London. Some time ago Lord Byron's books were sold at auction, and there was a great deal of splendid edition of Shakespeare. When it was sent round as a volume was missing. After the business inquiries of the auctioneer, the purchaser went to By-

"What, Coleridge, the author?" replied Byron. "I think Coleridge. "Ah! I remember. I was reading Coleridge's Early Rose old romance, and I, by mistake threw the book at her head, and she carried it out of the window!" Such is some of the wit of Coleridge."

Miss Cora Leslie Kellogg was recently the recipient of an elegant present, consisting of an exquisitely designed fruit receiver, lined with gold, and spoons and forks to match. Tastefully engraved upon the front of the fruit receiver were the words "11 Trovatore," and, on the 11th of the month was presented the several highly cultivated amateur critics and devoted admirers of Italian opera, who were desirous of showing their appreciation of the satisfactory manner in which Miss Kellogg acquitted herself in the role of Leonora, in "Il Trovatore," on the evening of the 10th ult.

Theodore, eldest son of Henry Clay, recently died in Lexington, Kentucky, of asphyxia, after a confinement. At thirty he was a promising lawyer, although he was not free from the imputations of being "wild." He had become deeply attached to a young lady of Lexington, who did not reciprocate his affection. Upon whom he was firmly and kindly repulsed when he began to show her special attentions. But the infatuated young man persisted in his suit, and followed the lady in the streets by day, and haunted the neighborhood of her home by night. Her parents, however, until it became evident that he was insane. Violent demonstrations were proved to be of such a disposition, and it became necessary to send him to an asylum. He remained there about a year, when his father, and for many years he was one of the most noted of the inmates of the asylum—his proud descent, his graceful manners, and his fine powers of conversation rendering him a marked object of interest. He leaves a widow and one daughter by his first marriage Washington. At the occasional balls given to the inmates he was always an exquisitely dressed gentleman of his day, and was the beau par excellence. During the last three years, despite his gentle gentleness and cheerfulness of manner, he was restless and discontented, and required close watching. Only a few days before his death he succeeded prudent to allow him to go out into the grounds without attendants. About the usual hour for his meditation began to grow warm, and he soon after became demented, continuing in hopeless idiocy until the day of his death. Two sons of Henry Clay yet survive him, T. H. Clay, ex-Minister to Paraguay, now residing on his place, "Ashmeldell," near Lexington; and John M. Clay, the raiser of Kentucky, and one of the greatest turfmen living.

There is a rumor that Queen Victoria has become matrimonially inclined, and is, indeed, effianced to a foreign prince of the blood royal, but without forsooth, the Royal Consent. She does not feel inclined to accept the regent; but give a little general advice on the subject. It is a difficult that there is a supply of rich peers in England, "ah honorable men," from whom the Queen might select a suitable husband—unless she intends to abdicate in favor of the Prince of Wales, in which case she might marry whom she chose.

SCENE OF THE RECENT MASSACRE AT MARATHON.

GREEK BRIGANDAGE.

We present on this page several illustrations à propos to the recent massacre of a party of travelers by Greek brigands in the vicinity of Athens. The party, our readers may recollect, consisted of Lord and Lady MUNCASTER, Mr. HERBERT, Secretary to the British Legation, Count BOYL, Secretary to the Italian Legation, Mr. and Mrs. LLOYD, with their young child, five years old, and Mr. VYSER. On the morning of April 11 they left Athens in carriages for Marathon, under the escort of four mounted gens d'armes, and accompanied by an intelligent and experienced dragoman named ALEXANDROS. On the plain they encountered several bands of soldiers patrolling the road, and felt no apprehensions of danger. After exploring the scene of one of the most interesting events in Grecian history, they started on their return to Athens. About half past four in the afternoon they were ambushed in a lonely part of the road. One of the gens d'armes was instantly killed and another mortally wounded. The brigands, twenty-eight in number, forced the party out of the carriages with much violence, seizing Lady MUNCASTER, and tearing off her watch and lockets, and menacing the lives of all. They then hurried their captives off the road, easily repulsing an attack by a small detachment of soldiers that had hastened to the scene on hearing the firing.

LORD

Reaching a place of security next day they halted after a long fatiguing march, and there agreed to release the ladies and children, to allow Lord MUNCASTER to return to Athens to raise the sum demanded for the ransom of himself and his four companions. The money, one hundred thousand drahms, was raised without difficulty, but in order to transport so large a sum of gold in safety it was necessary to obtain a promise of amnesty for the brigands, with an agreement that they should not be pursued in the mean time. On the application of the British Minister, the Greek Minister of War gave a written promise that the brigands should be let alone until the captives were released, but the amnesty was refused, on the ground that the king had no constitutional authority to grant it. A Greek officer was sent, however, to inform the brigands that, if they would take the money and release their captives, they could go on board a British ship of war, and leave the country for Malta; but they would not be persuaded ted to quit the neighborhood of the village of Oropos, where they had taken refuge, with their captives, and where they were surrounded by a force of 600 soldiers.

The brigand chiefs would not submit to these terms. They demanded amnesty for all their crimes, and refused to remain at Oropos, threatening to kill their captives if the troops opposed their march. On the afternoon of April 21, without waiting for the return of Lord MUNCASTER, who thus escaped the fate of his companions, they set out from Oropos, and were immediately pursued by cavalry. In accordance with their threats, they shot Mr. HENNIKER and Mr. LLOYD on perceiving the approach of the troops. A sharp battle ensued, in which six of the brigands were killed, including the chief. The others fled up the country, dragging Mr. VYSEA and Count BOYL with them, as far as Skimatari, where they put these two gentlemen also to death. Their bodies were afterward found and brought to Athens. They were mutilated in a shocking manner.

Our view of the Plains of Marathon shows the scene of the capture of this unfortunate party. The shore lies northeast and southwest, and is the chord of an arc about four miles in length, inclosing this celebrated plain. About the centre of the beach a small river, anciently called the Charadrus, falls into the n its course from the mountains, dividing the plain into two near- ual portions. The land side of the plain is closely set in by a t range of mountains, the eastern shoulder of Pentelicus termin- ng it to the southward. From Athens to the village of Marathon out twenty-two miles. The road for nearly the whole distance is eedingly bad; and in the mountains it consists of little more than e channels cut by the winter torrents. The plain consists of a ath of gently undulating ground, the higher parts of which are ntated. At each extremity the land is low and marshy. There ree or three small villages upon it with a few trees about their . e slopes of the mountains are in many places covered with myrtle, erwood, and small pines. The principal object of interest on the e is the tumulus shown in our illustration, supposed to be the nulchre of the one hundred and ninety-two Athenians who fell in eat battle with the Persians twenty-three centuries ago. Though mound is small—only 60 feet in diameter and 25 in height—it is arking object on the plain when seen from a distance.

NOTHING.

THERE is nothing to see!
It is only a silver birch!
But it comes like a beautiful joy to me,
Like the joy you feel so calm and free,
When all is still as still can be,
After a psalm in the church.

It is so fair and light!
It grows on a rock by a well!
The rock is so strong, and the birch is so slight,
That they fill my heart with a strange delight,
And I think they make a wonderful sight,
Though why I can never tell!

The rock I grasp and reach,
And the birch-tree I can not touch!
But its waiting leaves have a tender speech,
For I feel a particular love for each,
And I know that their whispered words can teach
And comfort me very much.

The rock is strong and wild,
And the well is wide and deep;
So I nodded my little head and smiled,
For I felt they could both protect a child;
And the birch-tree murmured soft and mild,
And so I fell fast asleep.

Why should this written be?
And what have I got to tell?
The wise, wise people will laugh at me,
And say there is nothing at all to see,
Only a rock and only a tree,
And only a little well!

THIRTEENTH SCENE.—FULHAM.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-FIFTH.

THE FOOT-RACE.

A SOLITARY foreigner, drifting about London, drifted toward Fulham on the day of the Foot-Race.

Little by little, he found himself involved in the current of a throng of impetuous English people, all flowing together toward one given point, and all decorated alike with colors of two prevailing hues—pink and yellow. He drifted along with the stream of passengers on the pavement (accompanied by a stream of carriages in the road) until they stopped with one accord at a gate —and paid admission-money to a man in office—and poured into a great open space of ground which looked like an uncultivated garden.

Arrived here, the foreign visitor opened his eyes in wonder at the scene revealed to view. He observed thousands of people assembled, composed almost exclusively of the middle and upper classes of society. They were organized round a vast enclosure; they were elevated on amphitheatrical wooden stands; and they were perched on the roofs of boroughes of carriages, drawn up in rows. From this congregation there rose such a roar of eager voices as he had never heard yet from any assembled multitude in these islands. Predominating among the cries, he detected one everlasting question. It began with, "Who backs—?" and it ended in the alternate pronouncing of two British names unintelligible to foreign ears. Seeing these extraordinary sights, and hearing these stirring sounds, he applied to a policeman on duty; and, with his best pronounciation, asked, "If you please, Sir, what is this?"

The policeman answered, "North against Smith—Sports."

The foreigner was informed, but not satisfied. He pointed all round the assembly with a circular sweep of his hand, and said, "?"

The policeman declined to waste words on a man who could ask such a question as that. He lifted a large wooden forefinger, with a broad white nail at the end of it, and pointed gravely to a printed Bill, posted on the wall behind him. The drifting foreigner drifted to the Bill.

After reading it carefully, from top to bottom, he consulted a polite private individual at his hand, who proved to be far more communicative than the policeman. The result on his mind of a person not thoroughly awakened to the enormous national importance of Athletic Sports, was much as follows:

The color of North is pink. The color of Smith is yellow. North produces barrel-shaped men, and South produces thirteen yellow boys. The meeting of pink and yellow is a solemnity. The solemnity takes its rise in an immemorial national passion for hardening the arms and legs, by means of hammers and of mallets with the first, and running and jumping with the second. The object in view is to do this in public rivalry. The men arrived at are produced by an excessive development of the muscles, purchased at the expense of an excessive strain on the heart and the lungs—(morality), glory; conferred at the moment by the public applause; confirmed the next day by a report in the newspapers. Any person who presumes to see any physical evil involved in these exertions, or any person who practise them, or any moral obstruction in the exhibition itself to those civilizing influences on which the true greatness of all nations depends, is a person without a biceps, who is simply incomprehensible. Muscular England develops itself, and takes no notice of him.

The foreigner mixed with the assembly, and looked more closely at the social spectacle around him.

He had met with these people before. He had seen them (for instance) at the theatre, and had observed their manners and customs with considerable curiosity and surprise. When the curtain was down, they were so little interested in what they had come to see, that they had hardly spirit enough to speak to each other between the acts. When the curtain was up, if the play made any appeal to their sympathy with any of the higher and nobler emotions of humanity, they received it as something wearisome, or assumed it as something base. Even the public feeling of the countrymen of Shakspeare, so far as they represented it, recognized but two duties in the dramatic—that of making them laugh, and the duty of getting it over soon. The two great events of a night were Supper and Fun. (Judging by the rare applause of his cultivated customers), consisted in spending plenty of money on his entertainment, and in hiring plenty of fun, forced women to exhibit their bosoms and their legs. Not at theatres only: but among other gatherings, in other places, the foreigner had noticed the same stolid languor where any effort was exacted from genteel English brains, and the same stupid contempt where any appeal was made to genteel English hearts. Everywhere—at work or playing any thing but jokes and scandal! Preserve us from respecting any thing but rank and money! Everywhere—in social gatherings of these insular ladies and gentlemen, as expressed under other circumstances, and in other forms, amidst other scenes. Here, all was changed. Here was the strong feeling, the breathless interest, the hearty enthusiasm, not visible elsewhere. Here were the superb gentlemen who were too warm to speak when an Actress addressing them, shooting themselves bourne with burst on burst of genuine applause. Here were the fine ladies who yawned behind their fans at the bare idea of being called on to think or to feel, waving their handkerchiefs in honest delight, and actually flushing with excitement through their powder and their paint. And all for what? All for running and jumping! All for throwing hammers and balls.

The foreigner looked at it, and tried, as a citizen of a civilized country, to understand it. He was still trying—when there occurred a pause in the performances.

Certain hurdles, which had served to exhibit the present satisfactory state of civilization (in jumping), among the upper classes, were removed. The privileged persons who had duties to perform within the inclosure, withdrew from it; and disappeared one after another. A great bush of expectation pervaded the whole assembly. Something of no common interest in the importance was evidently about to take place. On a sudden, the crowd broke! Some of it fled, cheering from the mob in the road outside the grounds. People looked at each other excitedly, and said, "Dan to the front!" Others whispered peculiar names—and was a second time broken by peculiar cheering. Everybody nodded to each other with an air of relief and said, "Both of them have come." Then the great bush fell on the ground, and every one of the eyes looked toward one particular point of the inclosure, opposite to the foreigner's position, with the blinds down over the open windows, and the door closed.

The foreigner was deeply impressed by the silent expectation of the great throng about him. He felt his own curiosity rising, without knowing why. He believed himself to be on the point of understanding the English people.

Some circumstance was about to occur, in evidently in preparation. Was a great orator going to address the assembly? Was a glorious anniversary to be commemorated? Was a memorial service to be performed? He looked round him to apply for information once more. The gentlemen—who contrasted favorably, so far as refinement of manner was concerned, with most of the spectators present—were always making their way, at that moment, through the crowd near him. He respectfully asked another policeman—who was now about to take place. They informed him that a pair of strong young men were going to run round the inclosure for a given number of turns, with the object of ascertaining which could run the longest distance.

The foreigner listened to his hands and eyes to discover. Oh, multitudinous Providence! who would have suspected that the ultimate development of the creation included such beings as these! With that amazing discovery, he took his back on the race-course, and left the place.

On his way out of the inclosure, he accosted one to use his handkerchief, and found that it was gone. He felt next for his purse. His purse was missing also. He gave it up, and went back to his own country, intelligent inquiries were addressed to him on the subject of England. He could but one thing to give. "They run round it," is a mystery to me. Of all the English people I have encountered, the English thieves!"

In the mean time the sporting gentlemen, making their way through the crowd, reached a wooden gate in the fence which surrounded the inclosure. Presenting a ticket to the person in charge of the gate, they were forthwith admitted within the sacred precincts. The closely packed spectators, recognizing them with awkward feelings of envy and curiosity, wondered who they might be. Were they referees appointed to act at the coming race? or reporters for the newspapers? or commissioners of police? They were neither the one nor the other. They were only Mr. Speedwell, the surgeon, and Sir Patrick Lundie.

The two gentlemen walked into the centre of the inclosure, and looked round them.

The grass on which they were standing was girdled by a broad smooth path, composed of finely-sifted ashes and sand—and this again was surrounded by the fence and by the spectators ranked behind it. Above the lines this formed rose on one side the amphitheatres with their tiers of crowded benches, and on the other the long rows of carriages with the right-seers inside and out. The evening sun was shining brightly; the light and shade lay together in grand masses, the varied colors of objects blended softly one with the other. It was a splendid and an inspiriting scene.

Sir Patrick turned from the rows of eager faces that looked down on his friend the surgeon.

"Is there one person to be found in this vast crowd," he asked, "who has come to see the race with the doubt in his mind which has brought us to see it?"

Mr. Speedwell shook his head. "Not one of them knows or cares what the struggle may cost the men who are to run it."

Sir Patrick looked round him again. "I almost wish I had not come to see it," he said. "If this were private—"

The surgeon interposed. "Don't dwell needlessly, Sir Patrick, on the gloomy view," he joined. "The opinion I have formed has, thus far, no positive grounds to rest on. I am guessing rightly, I believe, but at the same time I am guessing in the dark. Appearances sway a race mainly. There may be reserves of vital force in Mr. Delamayn's constitution which I don't suspect. I am here to learn a lesson—not to see a prediction fulfilled. I know his health is broken, and I believe he is going to run this race at his own request. Don't feel too sure beforehand of the event. The event may prove me to be wrong."

For the moment Sir Patrick dropped the subject. He was not in his usual spirits.

Since his interview with Anne had satisfied him that she was Geoffrey's lawful wife, the conviction had inevitably forced itself on his mind that the only possible chance for her in the future was the chance of Geoffrey's death. Horrible as it was to him, he had been possessed by that one idea—go where he might, do what he might, struggle as he might to force his thoughts in other directions—he looked round on the eager ashen path on which the race was to be run, conscious that he had a secret interest in it which it was unutterably repugnant to him to feel. He tried to resume the conversation with his friend, and to think of other topics. The effort was useless. In despite of himself, he returned to the one fatal subject of the struggle that was now close at hand.

"How many times must they go round this enclosure," he inquired, "before the race is ended?"

Mr. Speedwell turned toward a gentleman who was passing him at the moment.

"Here is somebody coming who can tell us," he said.

"You know him?"

"He is one of my patients."

"Who is he?"

"After the two runners he is the most important personage on the ground. He is the final authority—the umpire of the race."

The person thus described was a middle-aged man, with a remarkably wrinkled face, with prematurely white hair, and with something of a heavy look about him—brief in speech, and quick in manner.

"The path measures four hundred and forty yards round," Mr. Speedwell said, when the surgeon had repeated Sir Patrick's question to him. "In plainer words, and not to put you to your arithmetic, three round is a quarter of a mile. Each round is called a 'Lap.' The men must run sixteen laps to finish the race. Want to put you to your arithmetic again, they must run four miles—the longest race of this kind which it is customary to attempt at Fulham. Yes?"

"Professional pedestrians exceed that limit, do they not?"

"Considerably—on certain occasions."

"Are they a long-lived race?"

"Far from it. There are exceptions when they live to be old men."

Mr. Speedwell looked at Sir Patrick. Sir Patrick put a question to the umpire.

"You have just told us," he said, "that the two men who are to run against to-day are going to run the longest distance yet attempted in their experience. Is it generally thought, by persons who understand such things, that they are both fit to bear the exertion demanded of them?"

"You can judge for yourself, Sir. Here is one of them."

He pointed toward the pavilion. At the same moment there rose a mighty clapping of hands from the great throng of spectators. Fleetwood, champion of Smith, descended in his pink colors, descended the pavilion steps and walked into the arena.

Young, lithe, and elegant, with supple strength expressed in every movement of his limbs, with a bright smile on his resolute young face, the man of the north won the women's hearts at starting. The murmur of eager talk rose among them on all sides. The men were quieter—especially the men who understood the subject. It was a matter of hand-clapping rattled all round the arena. Delamayn, champion of the South, decorated in his yellow colors, presented himself to the public view.

The immense hum of voices rose louder and louder as he walked into the centre of the great green space. Surprise at the extraordinary contrast between the two men was the prevalent emotion of the moment. Geoffrey was more than a head taller than his antagonist, and broader in full proportion. The women who had been charmed with the easy gait and confident smile of Fleetwood, were all more or less painfully impressed by the noble strength of the southern man, as he passed before them slowly, with his head down and his brows knit, deaf to the applause showered on him, reckless of the eyes that looked at him; speaking to nobody: concentrated in himself; being his time. He held the men who understood the subject breathless with interest. What was it was the famous "staying power" that was to endure in the last terrible half-mile of the race, when the nimble and jaunty Fleetwood was cut off his legs. Thoughts had been spread abroad hinting at something which had gone wrong with Delamayn in his training. And now that all eyes could judge him, his appearance suggested criticism in some quarters. It was remarked by many of the criticism passed on his antagonist. The doubt as to Delamayn was—whether he had been sufficiently trained. Still the solid strength of the man, the slow, panther-like smoothness of his movements had, above all, his great reputation in the world of muscle and sport—had their effect. The betting which, with occasional fluctuations, had held steadily in his favor thus far, held, now that he was publicly seen, steadily in his favor still. "Two to one" was the current offer, if you like; but Delamayn for a four-mile race."

"Do you think he sees us?" whispered Sir Patrick to the surgeon.

"He sees nobody."

"Can you judge of the condition he is in, at this distance?"

"He has twice the muscular strength of the other man—His trunk and limbs are magnificent. It is useless to ask me more than that about his condition. We are too far from him to see his face plainly."

The conversation among the audience began to flag again, and the silent expectation set in among them once more. One by one, the different persons officially connected with the race gathered together on the grass. The trainer Perry was among them, with his cap of water in his hand, in attendance whispering conversation with his principal—giving him the last words of advice before the start. The umpire, leaving them together, came up to pay his respects to his illustrious colleague.

"How has the race got on since I was at Fulham?" asked Mr. Speedwell.

"First-rate, Sir! It was one of his bad days when you saw him. He has done wonders in the last eight-and-forty hours."

"Is he going to win the race?"

Privately the doctor had done what Perry had done before him—he backed Geoffrey's antagonist. Publicly he was true to his colors. He cast a disparaging look at Fleetwood—and answered his friend about the slightest hope.

At that point, the conversation was suspended by a sudden movement in the inclosure. The runners were on their way to the starting-place. The moment of the race had come.

Shoulder to shoulder, the two men waited—each with his foot touching the mark. The firing of a pistol gave the signal for the start. At the instant when the report sounded, they were off.

Fleetwood at once took the lead: Delamayn following, at from two to three yards behind him. In that order, they ran the first round, the second, and the third—both reserving their strength; both watched with breathless interest by every soul in the place. The trainers, with their cans in their hands, ran backward and forward over the grass, measuring their pace with quick points, and eying them narrowly, in silence. The official persons stood together in a group, their eyes following the runners round and round with the closest attention. The trainer's doctor, still attached to his old college, Oxford, offered the necessary explanations to Mr. Speedwell and his friend.

"Nothing much to see for the first mile, Sir, except the 'style' of the two men."

"You mean they are not really exerting themselves yet?"

"No. Getting their wind, and feeling their legs. Pretty runner, Fleetwood—if you notice, Sir? Gets his legs a trifle better in front, and steadily lifts his knees. Not the style for a four mile. His action's the best of the two; I grant that. But just look, as they come by, which keeps the straightest line. There's where Delamayn has him! It's a steadier, stronger, truer pace: and —call it six of him where he's half-way through. So, for the first three rounds, the doctor explained on the two contrasted "styles"—in terms mercifully adapted to the comprehension of persons unacquainted with the language of the running ring.

At the fourth round—in other words, at the round which completed the first mile, the first change in the relative positions of the runners occurred. Delamayn suddenly dashed to the front. Fleetwood smiled as the man passed him. Delamayn held the lead till they were half-way through the fifth round—when Fleetwood, at his turn, passed his trainer, and led the pace. He lightly passed Delamayn in an instant; and led again to the acclamations of the sixth round. At the opening of the seventh, Delamayn forced the pace on his side. For a few moments, they ran exactly abreast. Then Delamayn drew away inch by inch; and recovered the lead. The first burst of applause (led by the north) rang out, as the big man beat Fleetwood at his own tactics, and headed him at the critical moment when the race was half run and half won.

"It begins to look as if Delamayn were going to win!" said Sir Patrick.

The trainer's doctor forgot himself. Infected by the rising excitement of every body about him, he let out the truth.

"Walk a bit!" he said. "Fleetwood has got directions to let him pass—Fleetwood is waiting to see what he can do."

"Cunning, you see, Sir Patrick, is one of the elements in a manly sport," said Mr. Speedwell, quietly.

At the end of the seventh round, Fleetwood proved the doctor to be right. He also past Delamayn like an arrow from a bow. At the end of the eight round, he was leading by two yards. Half the race had then been run. Time, ten minutes and thirty-three seconds.

Toward the end of the ninth round, the pace slackened a little; and Delamayn was in front again. He kept ahead, until the opening of the eleventh round. At that point, Fleetwood flung up one hand in the air with a gesture of triumph; and bounded past Delamayn with a shout of "Hooray for the North!" The shout was echoed by the spectators. In proportion as the exertion began to tell upon the runners, the excitement steadily rose among the people looking at them.

At the twelfth round, Fleetwood was leading by six yards. Cries of triumph rose among the adherents of the north, met by counter-cries of defiance from the south. At the next turn Delamayn resolutely lessened the distance between his antagonist and himself. At the opening of the fourteenth round, they were coming side by side. A few yards more, and Delamayn was in front again, amidst a roar of applause from the whole public voice. Yet a few yards further, and Fleetwood was in front again; passed Delamayn behind again; led again; and was passed again at the end of the round. The excitement rose to its highest pitch, as the runners—gasping for breath; with dark-flushed faces, and heaving breasts—alternately passed and repassed each other. Oaths were heard now as well as cheers. Women turned pale, and men set their teeth, as the last round but one began.

At the opening of it, Delamayn was still in advance. Before six yards more had been covered, Fleetwood betrayed the purpose of his running in the previous round, and electrified the whole assembly, by dashing past his opponent—for the first time in the race at the top of his speed. Every effort present could see, that Delamayn had been allowed to lead on sufferance—had been dexterously drawn on to put out his whole power—until he had, then, and not then, been seriously deprived of the lead. He made another effort, with a desperation that convulsed the public enthusiasm to frenzy. While the voices were roaring; while the hats and handkerchiefs were waving round the course; while the actual event of the race was, for one supreme moment, still in doubt—Mr. Speedwell caught Sir Patrick by the arm.

"Prepare yourself!" he whispered. "It's all over."

As the words passed his lips, Delamayn swerved on the path. His footing failed—and he fell heavily. He rallied, and ran another step or two—swerved again—staggered—lifted his arm to his mouth on the breast, as if in a fury of rage—bared his teeth in his flesh like a wild beast—and fell senseless on the course.

A Babel of sounds arose. The cries of alarm in some places, mingling with the shouts of triumph from the backers of Fleetwood; the cheers as their man ran lightly on to win the now uncontested race. Not the inclosure only, but the course itself was invaded by the crowd. In the midst of the tumult the fallen man was drawn on to the grass—with his head resting on the trainer's doctor in attendance on him. At the terrible moment when the surgeon laid his hand on the breast, Fleetwood passed the inclosure gate, rage being forced for him through the people by his friends and the police—running the sixteenth and last round of the race.

Had the beaten man fainted under it, or had he died under it? Every body waited with bated eyes pivoted on the surgeon's hand.

The surgeon rose from him, and called for water to throw over his face, for brandy to put into his mouth. He was coming to life again—he had quivered at the touch. Only about of aquiver which hailed Fleetwood's victory rang out as they lifted him from the ground to carry him to the pavilion. Sir Patrick (admitted at Mr. Speedwell's request) was the one stranger allowed to pass the door. The movement when he was ascending the steps, some one touched him. It was Mr. Speedwell's brewer.

"Do the doctors answer for his life?" asked the captain. "I can't get my niece to leave the ground till she is satisfied of that."

Mr. Speedwell heard the question, and replied to it briefly from the top of the pavilion steps.

"For the present—yes," he said.

The captain thanked him, and disappeared.

They entered the pavilion. The necessary restorative measures were taken under Mr. Speedwell's directions. There the conquered athlete lay: outwardly an inert mass of strength, formidable to look at, even in its fall; inwardly, a weaker creature in all the constituents vital force, than the fly that buzzed on the window-pane. By slow degrees the fluttering life came back. In the sun was setting, and the morning light was beginning to fail. Mr. Speedwell beckoned to Ferry to follow him into an unoccupied corner of the room.

"In half an hour or less he will be well enough to be taken home. Where are his friends? He has a brother—hasn't he?"

"His mother's in Scotland, Sir."

"His father?"

Ferry scratched his head. "From all I hear, Sir, he and his father don't agree."

Mr. Speedwell applied to Sir Patrick.

"Do you know any thing of his family affairs?"

"Very little. I believe what the man has told you to be the truth."

"Is his mother living?"

"Yes."

"I will write to her myself. In the mean time, somebody must take him home. He has plenty of friends here. Where are they?"

He looked out of the window as he spoke. A throng of people had gathered round the pavilion, waiting to hear the latest news. Mr. Speedwell directed Ferry to go out and search among them for any friends of the employer whom he might know by sight. Ferry hesitated, and scratched his head for the second time.

"What are you waiting for?" asked the surgeon, sharply. "You know his friends by sight, don't you?"

"I don't think I shall find them outside," said Ferry.

"Why 't or?"

"They locked him heavily, Sir—and they have all left."

Deaf to this unanswerable reason for the absence of friends, Mr. Speedwell found on seeing Ferry out to search among the persons who composed the crowd. The trainer returned with his report. "You were right, Sir. There are some of his friends outside. They want to see him."

"Let two or three of them in."

Three came in. They stared at him. They uttered brief exclamations of pity in turn. They said to Mr. Speedwell, "We wanted to see him. What is it now?"

"It's a break-down in his health."

"And training?"

The athletic Spectre.

"Oh! Thank you. Good-evening."

Mr. Speedwell showed a form them out like a flock of sheep before a dog. There was not even time to put the question to them as to who was to take him home.

"I'll look after him, Sir," said Ferry. "You can trust me."

"I'll go too," added the trainer's doctor; "and see him littered down for the night."

"What is your name, my man?" asked Mr. Speedwell, turning to the trainer.

He answered with a thick snort and laboring breath—uttering a word at a time: "Shall—I—die?"

"Not if you're sober."

"Swe?"

"No."

He looked round him again. This time his eyes rested on Ferry. Ferry came forward.

"What can I do for you, Sir?"

The reply came slowly as before. "My—cont—pocket."

"This one, Sir?"

"No."

"This?"

"Yes. Book."

The trainer felt in the pocket, and produced a betting-book.

"What's to be done with this, Sir?"

"Read."

The trainer held the book before him; open at the last two pages on which entries had been made. He called his head impatiently from side to side of the sofa pillow. It was plain that he was not yet sufficiently recovered to be able to read what he had written.

"Shall I read for you, Sir?"

"Yes."

The trainer read three entries, one after another, without result; they had all been honestly settled. At the fourth, the employer's name was said, "Stop!" This was the first of the entries in which still remained unsettled. Ferry recorded the wager laid at Windygates, when Geoffrey had backed himself (in defiance of the sureties equally) to win the Ferry-hill Handicap the race next spring—and had forced Arnold Brinkworth to bet against him.

"Well, Sir? What's to be done about this?"

He collected his strength for the effort; and answered by a single word.

"Write—brother—Julius. Pay—Arnold—Brinkworth."

His lifted hand, solemnly emphasizing what he said, dropped at his side. He closed his eyes; and fell into a heavy stertorous sleep. Give him his due. Scoundrel as he was, give him his due. The awful moment, when his life was trembling in the balance, had found him at the last living faith left among the men of his tribe and time—the faith of the betting-book.

Sir Patrick and Mr. Speedwell quitted the race-ground together, and drove Geoffrey home, previously removed to his lodgings hard by. They met others on the road that night. On hand, by his own desire, kept out of view among the crowd; and he decided on walking back by himself. Sir Patrick's manner, likewise, had changed him in all his habits. He asked but one question, and received but one answer. An elapse before he saw his wife again—to be allowed to rest it in his own way, and to be left alone.

Relieved of the oppression which had kept him silent while the race was in progress, Sir Patrick put a question to the surgeon as they drove home, which had been in his mind from the moment when Geoffrey had lost the day.

"I hardly understand the anxiety you showed about Delamayn," he said, "when you found that he had only fainted under the fatigue. Was it something more than a common fainting fit?"

"It is useless to conceal it now," replied Mr. Speedwell. "He has had a narrow escape from a paralytic stroke."

"Was that what you dreaded when you spoke to him at Windygates?"

"That was what I saw in his face when I gave him the warning. I was right, so far. It was wrong in my estimate of the reserve of vital power left in him. When he dropped on the race-course, I firmly believed we should find him a dead man."

"Is it hereditary paralysis? His father's last illness was of that sort."

Mr. Speedwell smiled. "Hereditary paralysis?" he repeated. "Why the man is (naturally) a phenomenon of health and strength—in the prime of his life. Hereditary paralysis might have found him out thirty years hence. His rowing and his running, for the last four years, are alone answerable for what has happened to-day."

Sir Patrick ventured on a suggestion.

"Surely," he said, "with your name to compel attention to it, you ought to make this public—as a warning to others?"

"It would be quite useless. Delamayn is far from being the first man who has dropped at foot-racing or the cruel across laid on the vivid organs. The public have a happy knack of forgetting these warnings. The public has not quite satisfied when they found the other man (who happens to have got through it) produced as a sufficient answer to me.

Anne Silvester's future was still dwelling on Sir Patrick's mind. His next inquiry related to the serious subject of Geoffrey's prospect of recovery in the time to come.

"He will soon recover," said Mr. Speedwell. "Paralysis is hanging over him. How long he may lose it is impossible for me to say. Much depends on himself. In his condition, any new imprudence, any violent emotion, may kill him at a moment's notice."

"If no accident happens," said Sir Patrick, "will he be sufficiently himself again to leave his bed and go out?"

"Certainly."

"He has an appointment that I know of for Saturday next. Is it likely that he will be able to keep it?"

"Quite likely."

Sir Patrick said no more. Anne's face was before him again, with the unreasonable moment when he had told her that she was Geoffrey's wife.

ART AND MORALITY

We can not tell to remark, says Mr. Ruskin in a recent lecture, that it is not in the peace and purity of simple peasant life that Art is to be found; for there Art attains its highest perfection in a stage of civilization sullied by crime—that the immediate connection of Art may almost be allowed to be a sure sign of a nation's approaching ruin. For Art finds its highest perfection by its connection with evil—its noblest development by its struggle with what is base and degrading—it is hence that it derives its power. The virtues of artists possess no apparent, not real; it is their ignorance of evil and the absence of all temptation which make them virtuous. A noble nation, as it hastens on the path of progress, passes through a stage of feverish energy, which increases as, step by step, it draws nearer to its perfection. At last consummation is reached, and the people display the new kinds of error spring up from inability to satisfy the one or to minister to the other; wealth increases, and luxury follows, while the arts are the exponent of each phase of its growth or decline. At the consummation ends, but Art does not in any way bring it about; it rather is that wealth, that root of all evil, has made all the nation's ministers to evil purposes, and it has caused Art to do so to the last.

Although it is true that no more splendid era there has been an element of sorrow in their character, a kind of momentary despair from time to time, arising from their consciousness of the unprofitableness of their short-lived service, yet in most of their history power has been a strong instinct of duty or a hopeful love of doing well their might all that the great Master gives them to do. Art is not co-exist with what is selfish: the true artist must have an energy of love joined to an energy of labor. These two instincts are necessary—the one to teach him to deal kindly with surrounding life, the other to enable him to deal kindly with matter. All in him must be strong, and yet gentle and obedient; he must possess an natural instinct, but only bring it into proper subjection. Anger, for instance, must not be starved, as it is too often starved in modern life. We suppress our just feeling of vengeance against evil; we make the cat of punishment expedient, and not the vindicating of the majesty of Justice; we put our criminal to death, not because he deserves to die, but that we may serve as a monitor to prevent others doing the like.

Art, then, always may be founded on a love of order based on justice, and on a love of beauty based on efficience. This latter is an essential part of the Greek character: it is the direct adversary of cruelty, avarice, mean worldly care. The harmony of all these powers in the mind of Always commensurate with the imaginative purity of the passion of love.

The moral power of imagination is unbounded; it is on the gradual increase of the dignity of this relationship between the senses that the gradual increase of the imaginative faculty depends. It was imperfect among the Greeks because of the subordinate position of women and the presence of inferior passions, whereby the ethical superiority of the Greek mind was arrested. In its highest form imagination gives rise to the noblest chivalry—that bulwark of honor and of patience. Its highest function is not to suppress the passions, but to exalt them to right objects.

Imagination, rightly cultivated, gives us a true knowledge of the past, a firm grasp of the present, a confident hope for the future. It is our best educator: it fills our conceptive faculty with noble thoughts when directed aright; it enables us to conquer that kingdom of our thoughts wherein lies our noblest victory. Better is he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city.

True Art, then, is never immoral—we might almost say that little else but Art is moral; for in life without industry is guilty, as industry without Art is brutality. But we must always remember that in order to be great artists we must first of all be good men; that his only powers and prospers who hath not lift up his mind unto vanity, and deceitfully pursues solely what is pure and honest and of good report.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"You are quite welcome," as the empty purse said to the thirsty traveler.

An instance of distinction without a difference was the Siamese twins, having legs of different sizes, ordered boots to match. Consequently, as the one had a foot and ankle twice as large as the other, he had to boot upon the larger leg, he exclaimed, indignantly: "Confound the fellow! I ordered him to make one larger than the other, and, instead of that, he has made one smaller than the other."

A quarrel on the Boulevards terminated one day, to the amusement of the spectators: "Monsieur! you shall give satisfaction, sir, for having called me a cad of laughter!" "Monsieur, I can not. I am a member of the Society for Protecting Animals."

"Why don't you wear your ring, my dear?" said a father, in a bell-room, to his daughter. "Because, papa, it hurts when I ring," was the sly answer by way. "Why business have you to have your hand squeezed?" "Certainly, papa, but still," with pouty pique, one would like to keep it in a reasonable order."

At a very successful séance the other night, a man burnt into ashes, and was the handsome describes very particularly a tall, blue-eyed spirit standing near with a wife-elevated arm, and his hair parted in the middle. "Do you know him?" inquired a by-stander, in a whisper. "Know him!" was the reply. "I guess I do! replied the unhappy man, wiping his eyes. "He was my best friend before I married, and he has been dead twice as long as my husband since he died." Quoth he murmured, in a voice choked with emotion, "why, why did you marry?"

An impatient Welshman called to his wife, "Come, come, bob's breakfast ready? I've had nothing since yesterday, and to-morrow will be the last day!" This is equal to the call of the stirring housewife, who shouted to the cook at four o'clock with, "Come, Sarah, get up! Here 'tis Monday morning, to-morrow 's Tuesday, the next day 's Wednesday—and the wood gone, and nothing done yet."

A young lady of Kansas City, one of the fashionable set, has abandoned omnibus out of fear of a few mortuigo since, on discovering, snugly ensconced in her chignon, a tenacious little mouse, which had crawled into, and made a bed of, that feminine adornment. Is this the latest fashion? Every young lady should keep a cat in her chignon.

A New London Sabbath-school teacher said to a little boy recently: "Suppose your father told you he should stop on your way to church, and ask you to go to a place with him. What would you say?" "Why, I would say I say?" repeated the little wag, "I would say you don't, you don't bother me; I'm bound for Sunday-school."

Sir Watkins William Wynne, conversing with a friend on the antiquity of his family, which is carried back to Noah, was told that he was a very old Welsh family. "Old!" said Sir Watkins, "I should say," casting his eye on the other, "when I was a pedigree of a particular family was shown to me: it first began with Adam and Eve in Paradise, and about the middle of it was a note in the margin: A bad date here, the manuscript rotted."

"Don't beat your carpets," says some kind-hearted person; "try kindness and firmness; and if that don't keep them down, send for a policeman and have them taken up."

"Why, Charlie, I am surprised to see you making such a blunder in grammar!" Charlie brightened, as ever, and retorted, "Why, I calculated to laugh, but, somehow, I couldn't."

A vulgar mason, who but because rich by the recent demolition in Paris, was anxious to marry his only son to one of the daughters of a nobleman. "I tell you would let my son marry one of your girls," said he to the father, "I said the father, "but I would like to wash the dirt that waits in the kitchen, or the girl that waits in the parlor."

A poor lord of Macnab was in the habit of riding a great secondary horse to the Musselburgh races, where a young wit asked him, in a contemptuous tone, "Is that your horse, my lord?" "Yes," replied he, "and the laird, broadsiding his whip in the interrogator's face, answered satirically as to preclude further questioning—"no; but it's the same whip."

An Irishman asked a gentlemen to write a letter for him. "What sort of a letter do you want?" said his friend. Tim O'Brien to come out to America. "Tell him, then," Barney said, "that I have got a house twice a week here." "You know very well that you get it every day," answered the amanuensis. "Faith, my lord, I do! but he would think I was foolish him. Sure, I'll tell him that I have got a house twice a week, and so as follows: "And I'll tell you, Tim, you've got a house to it; but if you're dead, you'll just send it back as usual."

A gentleman who solicited a few days ago left a bill for his boarding-house lady, supposing for such to much trouble, but stating that he must have "some place to sleep."

A few days ago a gentleman whose grocheries had been lost, was invited out to tea. On arriving at the house, he was asked by some to her little daughter, the good woman to be very particular, and to make no remark about Mr. Jenkins's nose." Gathered about the table, every thing was going well; the child prayed about, looked rather puzzled, and at last startled the table by saying, "Mother, what is the use nothing about Mr. Jenkins's nose? he hasn't got any."

A lady made reference the other day to Mr. Bryan's translation of Homer in the presence of an old lady, who suddenly remarked, with a look of wonder, "Why, I didn't know Mr. Bryan was the only besides Scotch translated. I can't think of his name now; but I'll be bound, say why!"

FIRST MUNICIPAL ELECTION IN RICHMOND SINCE THE END OF THE WAR—REGISTRATION OF COLORED VOTERS.—[DRAWN BY W. L. SHEPPARD.]

A GOOD WORD FOR OLD MAIDS.

The spitefulness of an old maid has become quite a proverb, because her own disappointment makes her envious of the success of others; and she is as quick in detecting flaws as she is open-mouthed in proclaiming them. The domestic and daily life of her neighbors supplies her with food for gossip, which is said to be the specialité of an old maid. It has been unconsciously affirmed that the Killenny cats are a fitting type of old spinsters of a certain class, and that a contest between them affords as much sport as the greatest lover of mischief can desire.

Admitting the justice, in some instances, of the complaint that is made against old maids, and not denying that some among them are as conspicuous for their sauvaise langue, we maintain that they have not the monopoly of it, but that married women have before now established a reputation for unequaled skill in backbiting and spitefulness against their sisters. We maintain also that, while admitting the evil tendency of every thing that contracts the affections, some of the pleasantest, most agreeable persons we ever known, we have found in the condemned ranks of old maids. We said that it required some strong countervailing influences to neutralize the consequences of a life disappointed of what may be said to be legitimate aims; but when these influences are in full and undiverted operation, the result is that they produce refinement and an elevation of character which is rarely found elsewhere. The discipline of life tries us all, whatever our condition may be. They who live and strive and fight against their trials expend their strength uselessly; but they who, on the other hand, accept and make the best of them, find a grace and a strength which more than compensate for whatever suffering and weariness accompany the search after the sweetness which lies at the bottom of even the bitterest cup. The old maid who has accepted her lot without repining, who cultivates her intellect and stores her mind, who enlarges her influence by making the trials of others in some measure her own, who sees that there is more than her a large sphere of usefulness which she can pursue undistracted by domestic and family cares, is a source of blessing to herself and others. Her presence is always hailed because of its healing influence. She can allay dissensions, knowing how to speak the "soft answer that turneth away wrath." As in the still moonlight the outer world loses whatever it may have of harshness, and all things are mellowed beneath its rays, so in the presence of one who is exempt from the sons of patience, resignation, and unselfishness, the world's irregularities are toned down and softened, and the tumult even of undisciplined hearts is stilled.

THE HEROINE OF THE FAST NOVEL.

The alliance between luxury and lust is proverbial; and it would be strange if the most enthusiastic admirers of sofas covered with black velvet, of rooms papered with pale azure hangings, silver-corded, and little sequestered beds strewn with mirrors and overhung by silver-winged angels, were to journey alive to the Elysian of charms which are not expressed by the word "spiritual." Accordingly, we find our fast novelists deeply enamored of the female body, and presenting it to us as seductively as the nature of their art will admit of; and, considering that perhaps the majority of our fast novelists are themselves of the fair sex, they likewise copiously indulge in frank admission for manly proportions. Sometimes we are presented to a stately woman—a splendid animal, the brilliancy of whose pale bright hair, and the perfect smoothness of whose great white throat, are heightened by the richness of her crimson black velvet, trailing over cool, white, voluptuous—chills by the passionless aspect of her soul the passions her presence inspires provokes; and this agreeable description unfolds the narrator the opportunity of making the remark, that she is not sure whether impressionel ugliness—supposing the ugliness to be moderate, and the passion intense—does not more attraction for men than iced beauty. Sometimes we are admitted to the private chamber of a young lady who has just prone on her bed, the tangled riches of whose sweet hair wander over her tossed pillow, and whose bare feet dangerously emerge from her dressing-gown, while a young gentleman leans over her in passionate admiration. Even a statue is described through a lover's verse flesh; and a lad of eighteen is represented as telling of the subtle emotion caused by the contemplation of a copy of the Venus Anadyomene excited in him—how he caressed the crossed arms, gazed on her undulating bosom and her pear-shaped breast, and pictured her to himself with her dark limbs raised by the rising swing of cool waters. Sometimes, "the fairest of God's works, a beautiful woman," steps out from her dressing-room on to her balcony almost the sun, with a goodly number of spectators below and on a line with her. The vivid light of the many-colored auburn heir that floats over her shoulders, and down the bare sleeves that hang loosely about her round white arms. Perceiving that a gentleman in a neighboring balcony is admiring her, with a voluptuous grace of attitude she flings back the lace sleeves still further, and sends a great float of warm hair down to her waist. All her movements are declared to say, in plain language, "Do you not see that I am lovely? In the soft shadows of my satin petticoat a tiny foot is tripped over its fellow, discloding the most delicate of ankles. Does not the roundness of my arms and the wealth of my hair attract you irresistibly?" When such bewitching creatures ride, there is always a wind that blows their habit closer to their figures. When a man enters the room, their first thought is, "There's a perfect figure, limb, and well-knit." They always carefully select their seats, for they are good judges of effect, and know how alluring they seem when the dazzling whiteness of their bust and arms are (for such is almost invariably the notion of grammar entertained by our voluptuaries) brought into relief by dark crimson settees, and when the half-averted head shows the delicate contour of the throat. They are of opinion that five-foot-ten in a man is, "for all practical purposes," better than six-foot; and their comments on a successful suitor are, that "she has a thundering good figure, and knows how to use her eyes."

JAPANESE CULTURE.

The Japanese are a cultivated people, with letters and literature partly of Chinese origin, but modified, in order to adapt them to Japanese use. They have also a distinct literature of their own, and their literature, though not rich in philosophical compositions, abounds in legends, in fables, in satirical descriptions. The Japanese have also highly developed artistic tastes; and painting, design, and sculpture are followed as distinct professions. The Japanese excellence with regard to perspective; but the coloring is brilliant; and in Japanese sketches, whether of plants or animals, power or landscape, there is a breadth, life, and truth which many European artists of much greater pretensions rarely equal. In fact, the best notions that we can obtain of Japanese life and its surroundings are to be derived from the numerous sketches by Japanese artists which exist, and which represent the people pursuing their daily occupations. Their houses have what the Chinese seem to be deficient in, a strong sense of humor; and this they exhibit in a very striking manner in their sketches, in which human beings are represented by typical animals. Thus, a man who has been in debt to an old priest is represented as a wolf, a group of Buddhist nuns as weasels, and a company of rats acting as tax-gatherers.

The artistic tastes of the people and their love of nature are both illustrated by their passion for flowers, and by the skill with which they are cultivated. No feat is considered perfect without flowers, and flower-shows with as much zest as production in Japan as in this country. The Japanese gardener is entitled to rank with the arts of raising new varieties of flowers, of grafting plants, so that different flowers and leaves grow in what seems to be the same tree, of dwarfing trees; and they are, above all, learned in the manufacture of dwarfed plants, which are kept in vases and as house ornaments. The Japanese delight in gardens, and they lay out small pieces of ground with wonderful skill, contriving to find ample space to narrow bounds' with much ingenuity. The vast number of fields indicates much garden ground, and the people make at least three definite excursions to the suburbs at different times of the year, to see with their own eyes how the seasons progress. These excursions are often made at nights, in which many families take part. The Japanese have also a great fondness for aquaria; every house possesses one, and an aquarium, with much skill in it, is a very common object to be seen in houses.

MONKEY HUMORS.

What a wealth or humor is comprised in the phrase, "A wilderness of monkeys!" What endless fun, what fresh capers, what brilliant faces, what infinity of by-play and private jesting, quite beyond the ken of the human comprehension, is being forever enacted in those leafy theatres where they hold their untiring revels! How little are they liable to the charge of coldness of a too pathetic audience, how free from the vulgarity of playing off to gallery, how careless about splitting the ears of the groundlings, how careful always to hold the mirror up to nature and show virtue her own feature, scorn her own image! Such have been for ever since. On the contrary, they seem to be continually playing to "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought"—a metaphysical monkey, mooning over his barren philosophy, with all the history of Adam and his surrounding fun. Even in captivity the merry race cultivate the drama. One lively bit we cannot we witnessed, in the monkey-house in the Regent's Park, a piece, the serious cast of which was the old conservatism principles, virtues, the passages of lighter matter. Perched on their high, commodious, and friendly trapezes, separation, or swinging airily on ropes, the community was unusually quiet, while a female monkey, not the least of whose attractions was a long cloth flounce which spread itself over part of her else rosesmeared person, was undergoing the fondlings with a cavalier whose nether-monkey was of a tender green, shading into gold. The impassioned scene, following violent protestations, followed the coy but loquacious Juliet, while that fearful grandfather of the whole family, the mangeed, nut-shells, and straws, till they arrived between a branch along which by extended antics the enamored monkey watched the proceedings. He may have been a rival, like the County Paris, or a dissatisfied relative, like Tybalt, or possibly he may have resented as an injury and a slight any preference of other attractions to his own; for he presented to the curious eye some excellent elements of brilliant scene. Be that as it may, without the slightest warning, he dropped like a plummet on the enamored pair, and, seizing Romeo, bit him in his gorgeous hinder parts. The injured swain, turning with a fine sprawling grin, grappled his assailant. Juliet fled, shrieking and fainting, mingling with the crowd in the contest, conveyed the tidings of the strife to all the cage, and "spread the truth from pole to pole." Thereupon all the other monkeys, leaving their own private concerns, vaulted from rope and perch toward the scene of action, where, with shrill clamor, they precipitated themselves on the combatants, and joined in a general fray; while an elderly and morose baboon, delayed by age and infirmity, arrived rather later, and, armed with a stick, belabored all indiscriminately who came within his reach. Shortly after, we beheld, in a neighboring cage, a monkey, of dark and sentimental aspect, clinging with hands and feet like a gigantic hairy spider, to the wire roof, apparently absorbed in meditation, while his tail hung perpendicularly down to the length of about a yard. This appendage offered irresistible attractions to a fiendish young monkey, who, creeping up behind, gave it a sudden tug. The meditative monkey was by no means startled, but, without changing his attitude, proceeded to use it as the vehicle of an animated gymnastic performance. Up and down the stave, nowsin discovered, slowly turned his head, and, after a patronizing glance at the pendent acrobat, resumed the serious cast of contemplation. Possibly this was intended as a practical illustration of the feat known to logicians as "jumping at a conclusion."

BEAUTY UNDER A CLOUD

May be relieved from any blemish caused by ordinary impurities of the skin, as pimples, cold sores, scurf, or what is called muddiness of the complexion, by the use of STAFFORD'S Iodine and Sulphur Powders. They act upon these disfigurements and discolorations in the venous and blood-vessels, thereby being exactly reverse of the suppressive washes and lotions, all of which are more or less dangerous. Instead of driving the impurities back into the system, to reappear in other parts of the body and in more virulent form, they, on the contrary cause them to be exhaled through the pores.

Sold by druggists. Package, 12 Powders, $1; 3 Packages, $2 50. Mailed free. Money sent at our risk.—Hall & Ruckel, 218 Greenwich Street, N. Y.

INTERESTING TO LADIES.

"For more than twelve years a Grover & Baker Sewing Machine has been in constant use in my family, and it has given complete satisfaction. My wife considers it invaluable in her family, as to all kinds of work she has done, the finest fabrics as well as the coarsest, with equal facility. After long experience of its excellences, we cordially recommend it to our friends as the most complete and reliable article, that in a few years will more than pay its cost."—Joseph Castle, P. E., Central Philadelphia District of the M. E. Church.

The Popular Tonic of the Age.

The dry has gone by when a medicine without merit could command and retain the confidence of the world. Advertising has become public to say many things, but in this shrewd and thoughtful age words will not suffice without proofs, and it is by the exercise of their private judgment men determine the relative value of the various articles recommended to their notice through the columns of newspapers.

HOSTETTER'S

has now been subjected to this searching ordeal for more than eighteen years, and the result is that it stands at the head of the class of remedies to which it belongs. It has distanced and irred down innumerable competitors, and is to-day the Standard Vegetable Tonic of the western world. The many objects which have followed its use in cases of dyspepsia, biliousness, nervous affections, intermittent fever, and general debility, and as a constitutional lavigorant, are entitled to its universal confidence. Physicians can ever abuse its reputation, for it is based on the most exhaust experience of the most eminent of the professes, embracing prominent and well-known citizens of every profession, occupation, and clime. There is not a country, or settlement in the Western Hemisphere where it is not a medicinal staple. No druggist or dealer in medicines would consider his stock complete without it, and the returns of the internal revenue department show that more than one million of dollars worth of proprietary restorative manufactured on this side of the Atlantic. Its beneficial results are made during a long series of years from the use of HOSTETTER'S BITTERS have convinced the whole community that the only true way to restore a debilitated system to an imbilitated system, or to put the body on its defense when exposed to the deleterious influences of a malarious, unwholesome, and impure climate, is to use the tonic, regulator, and purifier in use and the same time.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 702.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE REV. J. TRUMBULL BACKUS, D.D.

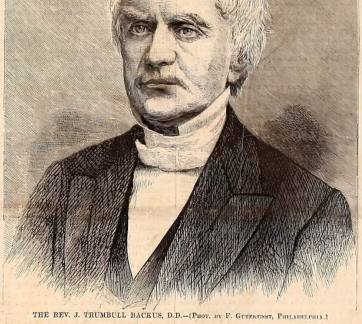
THE REV. J. TRUMBULL BACKUS, D.D., is the son of E. F. BACKUS, who was a well-known and highly respected successful merchant of Albany, in this State. He was born in that city in 1809. He was carefully prepared for college in the Albany Academy, and entered Columbia College, in this city, in 1823. His assiduity in his studies, and the activity and vigor of his faculties, gave promise of his future success in his professional life. He was graduated, with honor, in 1827, with the Senior Class of that year, among whom he was a general favorite. He immediately entered upon a thorough course of theological study, which he diligently pursued for three years at Princeton Seminary, under the direction of the venerated professors ARCHIBALD ALEXANDER and SAMUEL MILLER. Not satisfied with this regular course of study, he also availed himself of other opportunities, and spent two additional years at sister seminaries.

DR. BACKUS was licensed to preach in 1830 by the Presbytery of New York, Dr. PHILLIPS, Dr. KIRBY, and others now departed, being then among its members, with DR. SPRING, who still survives.

The young licentiate was invited, in 1832, to preach before the congregation of the Presbyterian Church at Schenectady. In response to a call soon after urged upon him, he was ordained and installed its pastor in December, 1832. He has never served any other church as pastor, having held that office in it now nearly thirty-eight years.

The influence of DR. BACKUS in the whole region of which his church is the natural centre has gradually but steadily increased. The president and professors of Union College have found him a constant helper in their important work. This college conferred upon him the degree of S.T.D. many years since.

DR. BACKUS has given faithful labor to the interests of the Presbyterian Church. He has been a commissioner to six different Assemblies. He has frequently served upon important committees. He was one of that committee which prepared for the use of the churches the "Hymnal," a valuable collection of sacred hymns with music, that has become widely useful and popular. He has been a bold and earnest friend of the "reunion," and contributed to its success. He is also possessed of views, original and much prized, upon the whole subject of the reconstruction of the Church. It is not strange then that he was suggested by many for the post of Moderator upon the convening of the great United Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, which recently met in Philadelphia. In a speech of singular eloquence, the Rev. DR. ADAMS, of New York, nominated him to this honorable position. He was elected, without any opposition, by a unanimous vote. As our readers will see, from the excellent portraiture of DR. BACKUS, which we furnish in our present number, he is a man of noble and genial presence. His manners are easy and winning, his parliamentary experience is full, and his decisions are prompt and impartial. In his replies to the various delegates from other churches his allusions are happy, and calculated to promote friendly and fraternal confidence. It is no easy task to control and direct the debates of an Assembly of nearly six hundred members, but DR. BACKUS seems to perform it without embarrassment or difficulty, and proves himself equal to every occasion. We also give on this page a view of the First Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, in which the sessions of the General Assembly were held.



THE REV. J. TRUMBULL BACKUS, D.D.—(PHOT. BY F. GUTEKUNST, PHILADELPHIA.)

SOCIAL SLAVERY.

CERTAIN arbitrary social arrangements are just as necessary, and for much the same reasons, as a currency. It is only a savage who has no established standard of value, and who, with amiable frankness, hits every man over the head as soon as he takes a dislike to him. The petty ceremonies of life are the small change which enables business to be carried on without striking a new bargain at every step; though it is not to be denied that many of them become exceedingly vexatious and eminently absurd. Nobody ever attended a funeral without inwardly reviling the hideous apparatus of undertakers, with all their preposterous mummery, which grates so harshly upon our feelings during the most solemn events of our lives. Why can't we be natural and simple even when we are taking our last leave of our dearest friends, and why must we be worried with all the buffoonery of plumes and hearses? That some conventional arrangement is essential is obvious from the fact that the very danger which we most reasonably desire to avoid is precisely that of being natural and simple. We wish to have some mode of testifying, without explaining, that the world at large whether the deceased was as the apple of our eye, or was an old ruffian who had at last taken the step which public opinion had immediately demanded for years. There is a decency in such matters which it is needless to defend. The public is only too anxious as it is to pry into feelings with which they have no concern; and it is as well for a uniform in which the true mourner and the indifferent observer may equally pass muster. It is most natural in the many things we are excluded in themselves simply because our neighbors do them, on penalty of pulverizing our quiet luncies and occasioning a mankind at large. People who talk about the decline of individuality are fond of declaiming that eccentricity should be encouraged, because it implies indifference to the tyranny of the majority. It may be so; but eccentric people often seem to be only slaves to public opinion who have hit upon a more cunning way of flattering their master, and appealing to the world at large for wonder, if not for praise. The value of doing as the world does is that it enables you to think as pleases yourself. You are like a person who wears a domino at a masquerade instead of appearing in a fancy costume, and practically you have most liberty when you do not dash your peculiarities in people's faces.

THE PARTIES.

THE late election in New York has been the occasion of a great deal of political discussion. The Democratic papers have hailed the result as an indication of the dissolution of the Republican party, and of the wide extent of the Democrats to power; while the Republican papers have explained the defeat by defective leadership, the want of decided issues, and the discord and fruitlessness of the Republican action in Congress. In suggesting remedies for the situation, however, there has been but very much stress laid upon a change of leaders and of prominent officers of the government. Party leaders are not arranged at will, but are not elected. They are displaced only by leaders of superior sagacity, and that can be determined only by experiment. When there are no cleverer men for party purposes in this State than Mr. TWEED and Mr. SWEENY, those statesmen, who are now the unquestioned Democratic managers, will be superseded. But they will lead until the cleverer men are discovered.

So with the Republican party. Certain persons will lead it until abler men for that purpose present themselves. If the present leaders are arraignable the party will retire them. The leaders may ruin the party, but they can not be arbitrarily displaced; for the person who should be able to persuade the party that their policy should be exchanged for another, would, by that fact, establish his claims to the leadership. As for the gentlemen in office, they can not remake nor save a party. Undoubtedly, in our system a judicious distribution of offices is very serviceable for party discipline; but that it can not save a party was shown in 1860 by the total overthrow of the Slavery Democracy, which for a generation had garrisoned every office, from the largest to the smallest, with the spoes and plums known. To change the office-holders, therefore, might in many instances be of great service, but it would not of itself renew the vigor of a party.

The political situation in the country is very intelligible. The President was elected by the Republican party upon the general issue of restoring upon Republican principles the results of the war. While that has been done by the Reconstruction acts and the Fifteenth Amendment, the President, who was not a politician, and who sought for office, as far as practicable, those whom he personally knew, and not those who had the strongest party recommendation, has by that course released the party discipline and unity. Meanwhile Congress, in a long session, during which the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment and the practical restoration of the States have formally disposed of the chief issues of the campaign, has not replaced those issues by others. There has been nothing done in regard to taxation, to a general financial system, to a civil service reform. There has been a long and fruitless debate upon the Funding bill and the Tariff. Upon every great question the Republican party has seemed to be divided. There is, at least, a three and of six months, no positive party policy in regard to immediate and pressing issues. Unluckily, also, the West Indian measures of the Administration are mistaken. Its wishes are not and can not be supported by the better portion of the party, which is favorable neither to annexation of the Alabama question, which would be a glory to any administration, has not yet been attempted. The great body of the party, therefore, is neither or half discontented; and that is a perilous frame of mind for my party.

We see that the action of Congress has formally disposed of the old issues; but, as we stated last week, they are not really settled, because the opposing views do not acquiesce. And this consciousness that the settlement is only formal, that the Democratic party, if successful, might renew any of the great questions of reconstruction, inspires a profound distrust of that party. Yet a party can not be rallied upon issues formally settled. It can not live-ouse, it must march.

But in the Republican party, therefore, demoralized and confused? It is going to pieces, and is the success of the Democratic party assure as its organs declare, and as some of its members honestly believe? Not at all. The distrust of the Democratic party by this country is too well founded to be easily removed during this generation. The party is said it to be the party of slavery, of rebellion, of repudiation, of ignorance, and of corruption. It is essentially an anti-American party. Moreover, if the Republican party offers the country no defined policy upon immediate issues the Democratic party offers no policy at all, but, however, the advantage of being in the opposition. It has no responsibility, and its silence, therefore, is not to be laid to it as a fault on the side. But has besides its fatal reputation, and the popular disgust with it—besides its want of a declared policy upon American issues, it is absolute tate for the Republican action—the Democratic party has no conspicuous leaders, no men whose names are known to the country.

We have already mentioned its most skillful chiefs. They are not Mr. BELMONT, the chairman of the National Committee, nor Mr. TILDEN, the chairman of its new York State Committee, but two men who are extremely distasteful to Mr. BELMONT and Mr. TILDEN—that is to say, Mr. TWEED and Mr. SWEENY. The party poper in the city of New York is an amusing example of their skill in influence upon the party policy and counsels as a GRIMALKIN upon the public affairs of Europe. It needs a Fenian riot to bring the party to the last witter, upon the masters of its party in this State, and they as incontinently bundled it into their baggage-cars as Marshal Forey dumped the valorous General O'Neil into a hackney-coach. It is now the lackey and laughing laureate of the King.

Looking further for leaders, the poverty of the Democratic party is dismally conspicuous. By common consent it—party—is not a party of gentleman of my personal power, magnetism, or influence whatever. He is without marked capacity, and steadily declining personal reputation, if, indeed, national reputation were sought, would the party look into Congress where are Mr. SEDGWICK or Mr. ELDRIDGE, Mr. M'VICKARS or Mr. M'CREERY, Mr. THURMAN or Mr. BAYARD, Mr. VOORHEES or Mr. WOOD, Mr. HOLMAN or Mr. COX? Is there an hitherto conspicuous as a Democrat would suit the exigency, and Mr. HOLMAN is the coming man. He is a Democrat because his father was one before him, and he is a Democrat because he is. He is emphatically an accident. He is the "creation" and the instrument of the chiefs, TWEED and SWEENY. They made him Speaker of New York, and his great osicial act is the signing of the Erie bill—one of the most monstrous jobs in all the history of corporate legislation, upon the rights of property-holders. They hope to make him President; and the little force of a gentleman of more than "local popularity" in General GRANT will discover greatness and grasp in Governor HOFFMAN.

Of the Democratic party, with its history and management and probabilities, we say that it is not, of course, in an intelligent and patriotic people, a profound danger. But as a political question, the American people would prefer the Republican inconsistency. But, as is constantly and truly said, a party can not be elected upon its past successes. If it shows itself bewitting and doubtful, if it fails to see and seize every occasion as it arises, it will be overthrown. Mere distrust of the Democratic party will not avail against its fine professions in a platform, if the Republicans are chilled and disheartened. The Administration, by which we mean the Executive and Congress, must take the initiative of positive action. The ablest statesmen in this country are in the Republican ranks, and they must comprehend their responsibility. There must be a simple and decided financial policy, and not a mere drift of words. The Alabama controversy must be bravely grasped and settled. The West Indian policy must be abandoned. The reform of the civil service must be actively pressed. Taxation must be lightened; and the whole revenue system simplified.

If gentlemen in Congress understood how carefully their conduct is scanned, how earnestly and sometimes how the best men of the dominant party in this country await some clear and precise course of action—if they felt as we all feel when we are immediate and daily contact with the current of public opinion, that the power of the Republican party is permanent if its confidence is retained, and that the restoration of confidence depends upon a prompt and vigorous and sagacious treatment of the actual issues of the hour, these gentlemen would take care that the last weeks of the session should atone for the first; and that when Congress adjourns it should have adopted measures that would be beneficially felt in every household and every interest, and that would be hailed by the common sense of the people as the vindication of the party which it loves and trusts.

THE FENIAN FOLLY.

THERE was something so transcendently absurd in the Fenian raid upon Canada that the indignation which it naturally excites is almost smothered in pitiless ridicule. And next to the folly of the movement was the cowardice of the attempt at grave treatment of it in some of the newspapers as a "movement" against the British empire. There were even solemn discussions of the chances and probabilities of this "invasion" by an "army" which did not even seem to be a regiment. Such a force, we knew, in the very crisis of "the war," was carried off to jail, by a constable, in a coach. It is certainly unfair to call a crude project, by which some men were possibly honest and innocent, but incomprehensibly foolish, lost their lives, and were made the prey of fraud professions, takes the money of hundreds and thousands who can not spare it, should be treated with respect by the press of this country. It is the duty of the press toward honest Irishmen to spare no pains in exposing the mixture of stupendous folly and knavery which is called Fenianism. And when the leaders send a mob against the innocent and peaceful homes of the frontier, whence does not tell the truth about it because a partner in the guilt.

A more ludicrous travesty of National sentiment than the so-called Fenianism can not be conceived. Certain ringleaders persuade poor men and women to give their hard-earned money, to leave their time, and risk their lives for "the liberation of Ireland!" Public meetings are held, and conspicuous politicians flatter the people, because they hope to propitiate the voters. There never were people who so sadly needed to hear the truth about themselves as the Irish in this country; and there certainly were never any who heard so little. What Irishman, of whatever education or position in this country, ever plainly told his countrymen the truth about this Fenian folly? The best friend of the Irish citizens is President GRANT, who promptly warned all marauders and breakers of the law of the risks they assumed. It is only to be regretted that there was not a British force sent to prevent the cowardly murder of the line by the mob, and which would have saved the lives of those who were shot. But it is not possible to see every point of such a long frontier as ours; and vigorous measures at the earliest moment of action is the only course to prevent bloodshed. Such vigorous measures are the prompt arrest of the expeditions. The Fenian detachments leaving various towns for the rendezvous are simply expeditious or enterprises against other countries with which we are at peace, and the members should be arrested wherever found. They are as amenable to the laws when they leave New York as when they march from St. Albans or Malone.

The Canadian people are more responsible for the misgovernment of Ireland than the people of Vermont; and it is intolerable that those who have been sent back to go to Ireland, not to fight England, should harass peaceable people in another country, and "humble the proud SAXON" before the Celt. The telegrams from Malone mentioned that "the invaders" occupied the cars without paying, and the conductor "pocketed the insult" for the sake of peace and the safety of his other passengers." The same day "an enthusiastic meeting of the friends of the Fenian cause" was held in Troy, and a company was recruited. "As the recruits were leaving the hall, three were arrested for burglary, and a fourth was a resident of Mr. GRAY." Three years ago, when the last "war" was made against Canada, the luckless inhabitants of towns in Maine, upon which the recruits were quartered, found themselves at the mercy of a mob, locked up their spoons, and sent their wives and daughters out of town. What security has any home, upon either side of the line, from the forays of such a crowd as the Fenian leaders are able to collect, under the pretense that the Irish republic can be established by robbing Canadian hen-roosts?

But it is no jest for those, either upon the American or Canadian side, who undertake to defend themselves against such incursions. It is not Englishmen nor Canadians—it is American citizens and homes that suffer most from these riotous and murderous outrages upon the frontier; and if the press seconds the Government in its resolution that our laws shall be respected, and our innocent neighbors left undisturbed, the Fenian fire will soon expire for lack of fuel.

THE FINANCIAL OUTLOOK.

On the 24th of May gold sold as low as 12½, the opinion prevailing that a Funding bill, satisfactory to the Secretary, would be reported favor with the Committee of Ways and Means, and that a larger amount of gold would be sold by the Treasury in June than had been in May. Owing, however, to a firmer demand for exchange, which rose nearly to the gold-shipping point, and to the Fenian uprising, gold advanced to 115. On the 27th of May the rates which prevailed here for gold and exchange, together with the momentary state of the market at New York and London for our public debt, permitted the sale of our bonds in London, and the drawing of cible exchange founded upon it. This was instantly done. Whereupon gold again receded, although the unfavorable strength that we are on the eve of the shipment of coin to London. One of our banking-houses, connected closely with California, and having branches at the principal money centres of Europe, exported gold bars by the steamer of the 28th, and previously, which bars, with Mexican dollars, constitute the forerunners of coin shipments. Both can be sent with better advantage than coin, while the smaller eagles, which latter are more profitable than old coins.

The precise point at which gold can be shipped with advantage varies slightly with circumstances. During last season a house which sent several millions when exchange was 109 (or 9-8 of one per cent premium) made only one per cent per pound sterling as the profit. The shipment, which consisted of new double eagles, went directly to the Bank of England, which, upon receipt into sovereigns, passed the amount to the credit of the shipper. If sixty-day bills were then sold at 9-8, the profit would, in the present condition of the money-market in London, may be shipped without a loss. The present rate for such bills is 9-8 to 1 per cent, or eight bills 10½ to 10¼. The percentage, as all but the unexperienced are aware, is calculated upon $9 4-8 as the amount of sterling which one thing. By an act of 1790, Congress, for certain purposes, established this value, following, perhaps, an English precedent which fixed the value of the guinea at the value of dollar at 4s. 6d. By a later act, passed in 1842, Congress declared that the value of the pound sterling shall be estimated in payments by or to the Treasury, and in valuing goods at the custom-house, invoiced in English money, at $4 84 to the pound sterling, as the fixed value, measuring the quantity of pure gold contained in the English sovereign with the like quantity contained in the American eagle. But the old basis of $4 44.4 has not been departed from in commerce, although it confounds all except those who are familiar with the subject.

The question, whether or not we are on the eve of shipping gold coin, is discussed in all our financial circles with great interest; but so many have been misled heretofore, and so inexplicable are the changes, as instanced by the rise in exchange to the 24th to the 28th of May, that people generally prefer to wait for events rather than to express their opinions. Among the circumstances which bear upon the question are these: that our cotton bills are nearly exhausted; that our bill leave no large sums until October; that Europe, in refusing to take our new railroad securities, indicates that they are held in sufficient quantity at home; that the crop failing on in England will call for the use of her loose capital.

The excess of our imports over our exports, which, for the financial year terminating on the 30th of June last, was about seventy-eight millions of dollars, has been diminished for the this year on account of our larger exports, but our annual indebtedness to the foreigner, arising from the present excess of importations, in excess in freights in foreign bottoms over what is carried in American—from the expenses of travelers abroad to that of Europe—and from the interest on bonds, national, State, and corporate, held abroad, is not less than one hundred and eighty millions of dollars annually, and our indebtedness we continue to meet with—how? So long as this is satisfactory to foreigners we do not see the difficulty.

The recovery of the English in their trade and industry is stated by the Economist—their chief financial authority—to be "general and marked." In the great manufacturing districts the demands of workmen in cotton for an advance of five per cent. in their wages is met by the statement that the improvement in the price of cotton yarns and cloths does not justify the advance. In other districts the manufacturers recommend a resort to short time, to meet not only the demand for increased wages, but also to affect the price of cotton, claiming that their interests require that it shall be reduced. The question is perplexing, as many laborers in the mills stand always upon the verge of pauperism, and the improved condition of the manufacturer is not sufficiently assured to justify an important increase of expense. On the other hand, the emigration of skilled workmen from England produces, in some districts, a scarcity of hands, which is the subject of serious complaint. Inasmuch as the rate of interest in England remains at three per cent., the extent of the improvement referred to by the Economist can not be sufficient of itself to induce a demand from this country for English labor, as they can at present earn more invested here.

Part of the prosperity now existing in Great Britain is attributed to cheap bread, which is enjoyed at our expense in part. The period of cheap bread is coincident with the pressure upon the gold market on this side, and is widely attributed to that influence. It rarely happens that cotton and wheat rule high in England simultaneously; and if the advance in price of the latter shall continue to a point which will afford remuneration to the farming interests of the Northwest, cotton might rise to a corresponding degree, unless the state of English industry and of the cotton supply conspire to prevent that result. Although cotton has arrived in England by way of the Suez Canal, yet up to the 12th of May, owing to the lateness and the deficiency of the crop, only 2355 bales more than usual had been received from India. The deficiency of cotton in England is now marked in the highest degree, and in the face of good middlings may be in demand as long as the supply lasts. The quantity of cotton still to be sent from this side may amount to from twenty-five to thirty millions of dollars' worth, not nearly enough, added to the value of our expected exports of grain, oil, cheese, and other productions, to keep pace with the indiscreet volume of our imports.

The indications continue to be strong that a large amount of grain will be required from us. This fact has given greater activity to trade in the West than is usual so late in the season. Trade has also been improved by the firmness in gold. If, between this and October, gold shall be required from us in considerable quantities, neither the passage of the Funding bill nor the sales of gold by the Treasury can prevent its advance in price. If, however, the foreigner shall continue to receive our securities to the extent in which our debt is now being increased, gold will continue as a low price until the day of settlement shall arrive. The postponement of that period will complicate our difficulties in the end, a result which the President will notice and guard against. In the present condition of the money market and of the tariff our exports are valued high, in order to obtain full advances, and imports are undervalued, in order to have low duties, so that allowance is to be made on both sides of the account to reach the true sum. A hundred and eighty millions of annual indebtedness can be contemplated only with anxiety by those who consider the difference between the circumstances now and those which must soon exist, when, instead of running up a debt, every year shall be compelled to pay in coin to the foreigner over eighty millions of annual interest, on corporate, State, and national bonds.

DECORATION-DAY.

DECORATION-DAY is becoming one of the most beautiful of our festivals. It is one of the loveliest season of the year, when the earth is brilliant with flowers and musical with birds, and when every thought of the dead is naturally most tender and most hopeful. Surely it is little to ask that, in the midst of our prosperity and freedom, one day shall be consecrated to the memory of the men who secured them by their lives. The current of events is so deep and swift that even the war is fading so fast from our memories. There is already a certain forgetfulness of the immense services of the soldiers and sailors; and there is a danger, living and lofty pride in the words of General SHERMAN, that he had earned the money that was paid him. If Decoration-day is not to be other purpose than to refresh in the public mind the sense of the claims of the soldiers, it would be a wise and most serviceable observance. But it does more. It renews the remembrance of the great cause in which they fell; and this is as serviceable as to celebrate the Fourth of July, and to recall the principles as well as the devotion of the Revolution.

It has been sometimes felt that the tendency of Decoration-day must be to preserve the memory of hostilities that should be forgotten. But this is not a necessity. There is no more distinctive in the remembrance of the struggle than there was in the spirit with which it was maintained. The dead soldiers are not honored because they were brave, and died—for their enemies were brave, and they also died—but it is the cause for which they fell that consecrates their memory; and that cause is as much that of their opponents as of themselves. It is not a private tribute of affection that we pay on Decoration-day; it is the expression of a national feeling of gratitude and joy. Just as independence was really the cause of the whole country, although the Tories did not believe it, so the perpetuity of the Union, as the security of the liberty and equal rights of every citizen, is the cause of the whole nation. If it were merely the celebration of the victory of the North over the South, nothing could be more unwise than such a festival. But obviously, and consciously upon the part of every one who shares in it, it is no more the celebration of a victory, in the limited personal sense, than our national anniversary.

Therefore we see no reason to doubt that it will gradually become a general and national festival. It may be otherwise observed than now, although it is not easy to imagine any observance more appropriate and beautiful. One of the most significant feasts of the Romish Church in Italy is All-souls' Day. Then the friends and relatives of the dead visit their graves, and the Church militant and the Church triumphant mingle. Let this be our All-souls' Day. Let it rest as meditatively to the graves of our heroes, and there, as we recall them and renew in memory our common hopes and joys and pains, let us also renew our vows to live for the great cause for which they died. The longer the day is celebrated the tenderer the feeling will become, and when this generation, which saw the war and felt its sharp wounds, has passed away, nothing but the cause and the heroism will remain for admiration and for undying honor.

THE RIGHTS OF RAILROAD PASSENGERS.

THE case of Mr. JOHN A. COLEMAN against the New York and New Haven Railroad Company, of which we have spoken more than once, is the case of every traveler who has a grasp of the great corporations. The case has now been tried for the third time, and the verdict is again for Mr. COLEMAN, with a somewhat increased damages. The general ruling of the Court, however, seems to have been as before. Apparently it is the case of a man to which, as the phrase is, justice is upon one side, and law upon the other; and as law is chiefly interesting to lawyers, it is the case of unjust precedents may become law. Mr. COLEMAN had a coupon ticket from New Haven to New York. Mr. COLEMAN, on the train after offered it upon the train from New York to New Haven. The conductor refused it, and also refused to listen to any explanation involving the test of the right claimed by Mr. COLEMAN. The conductor threatened, and Mr. COLEMAN offered to pay the fare over the line. But, under the immediate instructions of Mr. JAMES H. HOYT, the Superintendent of the road, the conductor refused to receive the money, and violently flung Mr. COLEMAN from the car, seriously and permanently injuring him. With the most singular indifference to the thing that the rights of all travelers were involved, Mr. COLEMAN sued the Company, and received thirteen hundred dollars damages. Mr. HOYT appeal set them aside as excessive. Upon the second trial the jury disagreed. Upon this third trial the jury have given thirty-four hundred and fifty dollars damages.

The Court, Judge PITMAN presiding, held that the ticket was a contract, and that the railroad Company may make such regulations as it chooses; that it had a right to eject Mr. COLEMAN from the train, and that the only question was whether unnecessary violence had been used. That is to say, the law authorizes a corporation to construct and publish the terms of a contract; forcibly to seize any person whom it chooses to regard as a delinquent, and to be responsible only for what the jury shall call excessive violence. Apparently this ruling regards the conductor in a railway car as a steamboat, in the same sense as a steamboat clerk to expel trespassers at his discretion. Of course, if such a preposterous proposition be law, it is for the Legislature to change it at the first day of the next Legislature. It permits every conductor, with the aid of brakemen, to exhibit peremptory and summary authority, similar to the scope and value of tickets, and the interpretation of the railroad regulations themselves. It puts the whole responsibility of the railroad corporation the most absolutely despotic authority. Nothing but the already enormous power of those corporations could secure such a privilege; and if this really be the law, it is but another illustration of the alarming increase of that power.

And if, as the Court holds, a ticket is a contract, where is the United States stamp? If it be a receipt, a receipt for fare paid it is not valid. Indeed, the extraordinary interpretation of law, and the boundless authority claimed by the Railroad Company, in the case of Mr. COLEMAN, if it chooses to do upon its trains, if once established, will subject travelers to every kind of oppression and inconvenience. We have recently called attention to the petty annoyances practiced upon the Morris and Essex road, and authorized by the management. It is merely insulting to say that, if passengers are dissatisfied, they can build a road to suit themselves. The railroad companies are corporations that are chartered by the people for the public accommodation, and the people should not be obliged to attempt jealousy of their rights. If they have not, as it is claimed, that the companies may make what regulations they will, let them take care not to repeat so fatal an error. The Legislature prescribes the limits of fare. It makes laws for the public safety upon the railroads. Let it also feel the determined pressure of a public opinion, which demands that the convenience and comfort of passengers shall not be wantonly outraged.

What occurred to a passenger—what evidence had Mr. COLEMAN—that there was any such rule as the conductor declares, that it is a rule which the Company may lawfully make, or that it has been made by the Company, and not by the Superintendent? In Mr. COLEMAN'S case, how did he know that what the conductor called the rule of the Company was really more than the whim of a Superintendent, who, upon appeal, would recognize the coupon, and upon the next, would not? We hope, sincerely, that this case may not be disposed of until there is an authoritative declaration of the law by the highest tribunal. And if it shall appear that this assumption is legal, we trust that the popular good sense will be so strong even for the power of the railroad companies, and that the law will be changed.

NOTES.

We hope, with the London Standard, that the race between the Oxonian and the Cantabrian will be the last of international matches. No good result whatever can come of them. They are but an immense excitement and jealousy, and enormous private exaltation upon the part of the victor, and a bitter and envious compliment of the vanquished, at the end. Mere success in a match proves nothing. The superiority of one system or building, or training, or sailing, or rowing, or whatever it may be, is determined only by the comparison of many years. Certainly no nobody was satisfied or comfortable or happy as the result of the Oxford and Cambridge race last year, except the winners, and John Bull and Jonathan. And the great result is only a little sharper feeling between the two countries. The jealousy of our international relation with England is wholly unworthy consideration of the circumstances. But what is most desirable now is not to foster that jealousy. It is not to put a chip on our shoulder, and then look insultingly across the sea. There are people who think that nothing would be fine as a war with England. But they are the people who ought to be gloriously disappointed. Boys at rival schools may learn each other's prowess by a pitched battle. But there is no greater nuisance than the man who is constantly anticipating a quarrel with others. All that is necessary for a man is to be ready to avoid difficulties with other nations; and one way of doing that duty is to decline with thanks, an "international match" at blindman's-buff, or any other of the manly pastimes.

THE latest illustration of personal news that is not news was in the announcement in one of the chief of our daily contemporaries: "The gentleman to whom Miss Smith has been erroneously reported to be engaged is Mr. Brown, who is at the distinguished statement of that name. It is, however, authoritatively denied by the parents of Miss Smith, and the story is entirely unfounded." That is the best of all padding, for there is an end to it at once. Thus if the paper really cares to write more copy, the city editor has only to write to the New York which Mr. Brown erroneously stated to have taken from the sappes-table at Mrs. ——'s ball, on Wednesday evening, was not that the case had been set in duplicated at TIFFANY'S. But Mrs. —— emphatically denies that any of her forks are missing, and the story is therefore quite without foundation, and very possibly malicious." Or, again: "Mrs. BROWN-JONES wholly untrue that Mr. HON. —— slipped upon a piece of orange-peel and fell in the most joyously in Broadway."

THE death of GEORGE W. DERBY, of the Daily Evening Journal, was not unexpected. He was but thirty-four years old, and had been long seriously ill. Mr. DERBY was a man of genius and great

CHAPTER V.

Departure from Delladilla.—Encampment Sixteen Miles up the River.—Hippopotamus Rincon.—Harpooning of a Crocodile.—A Hippopotamus Family.—Attack of the Male.—Prolonged Struggle.—Capture.

WE quitted the islet and encamped at Delladilla, the forest where I had first shot the bull elephant when the aggressors fought with him on foot. No European had ever been farther than this point of the river, which had only been visited by Florian and his companion, Johann Schmidt. After setting fire to the tall grass, which not only hid the game from us, but prevented us from overtaking it after we had discovered it, I resolved to explore the country for a fortnight, which would give the animals that had been driven off by the flames time to return to their lairs.

We followed the river to the foot of the mountains, and encamped sixteen miles above Delladilla, at the place where a party of the Base had been saluted the year before by the aggressors. Our huntsmen pretended that the enemy would try to take revenge on us; but the enemy was afraid of our rifles, and knew, besides, that we were strong in numbers. A dozen of howartis, or hippopotamus hunters, of the Hamran tribe, had joined our band, and we did not therefore make ourselves respected.

These howartis are full of skill and courage. Their trade is a perilous one, less from the hippopotami than from the crocodiles, amidst which they live continually without any means of defense. The harpoon which they use is a piece of soft steel about eleven inches long, with a narrow blade or point of about three quarters of an inch in width, and a single but powerful barb. To this short and apparently insignificant weapon a strong rope is secured, about twenty feet in length, at the extremity of which is a buoy or float as large as a child's head. The extreme end of the stout harpoon is fixed on the point of a bamboo about ten feet long, around which the rope is twisted, while the buoy end is carried in the left hand.

A little before sunrise, eight or ten days after their arrival, I accompanied the howartis for a day's sport. There were two of them; I say nothing of their followers. There were numbers of hippos in this part of the river, and we were not long before we found a herd. The hunters failed in several attempts to harpoon them; but they succeeded in stalking a crocodile after a most peculiar fashion. This large beast was lying upon a sand-bank on the opposite margin of the river, close to a bed of rushes. The howartis, having studied the wind, ascended for about a quarter of a mile, and then swam across the river, harpoon in hand. The two men reached the opposite bank, beneath which they alternately waded or swam down the stream toward the spot upon which the crocodile was lying. Thus advancing under cover of the steep bank, or floating with the stream in deep places, and crawling like crocodiles across the shallows, the two hunters at length arrived at the bank of rushes, on the other side of which the monster was basking asleep upon the sand. They were now about waist-deep, and they kept close to the reshes, with their harpoons raised, ready to cast the moment they should pass the rush bed and come in view of the crocodile. Thus steadily advancing, they had just arrived at the corner within about eight yards of the crocodile, when the creature either saw them or obtained their wind; in an instant it rushed to the water: at the same moment the two harpoons were launched with great rapidity by the hunters. One glanced obliquely from the scales; the other stuck fairly in the tough hide, and the iron, detached from the bamboo, held fast, while the float, running on the surface of the water, marked the course of the reptile beneath.

The hunters chose a convenient place and recrossed the stream to our side, apparently not heeding the crocodiles more than we should fear pike when fishing. They would not waste their time by securing the crocodile at present, as they wished to kill a hippopotamus: the float would mark the position, and they would be certain to find it later. We accordingly continued our search for hippopotami; these animals appeared to be on the qui vive, and, as the hunters once more failed in an attempt, I made a clean shot behind the ear of one, and killed it dead. At length we arrived at a large pool, in which were several sand-banks covered with rushes, and many rocky islands. Among these rocks was a herd of hippopotami, consisting of an old bull and several cows; a young hippo was standing, like an ugly little statue, on a protruding rock, while another infant stood upon its mother's back that listlessly floated on the water.

This was an admirable place for the hunters. They desired me to lie down, and they crept into the jungle out of view of the river. I presently observed them stealthily descending the dry bed about two hundred paces above the spot where the hippos were basking behind the rocks. They entered the river and swam down the centre of the stream toward the rock. This was highly exciting; the hippos were quite unconscious of the approaching danger, as steadily and rapidly the hunters floated down the strong current; they neared the rock, and both heads disappeared as they purposely sank out of view; in a few seconds later they reappeared at the edge of the rock upon which the young hippo stood. It would be difficult to say which started first, the astonished young hippo into the water, or the harpoons from the hands of the howartis! It was the affair of a moment; the hunters dived directly they had hurled their harpoons, and swimming for some distance under water, they came to the surface and hastened to the shore lest an infuriated hippopotamus should follow them. One harpoon had missed; the other had fixed the bull of the herd, at which it had been surely aimed. This was grand sport! The bull was in the greatest fury, and rose to the surface snorting and blowing in his impotent rage; but as the float was exceedingly large, and this naturally accompanied his movements, he tried to escape from his imaginary persecutor, and dived constantly, only to find his pertinacious attendant close to him upon regaining the surface. This was not to last long; the howartis were in earnest, and they at once called their party, who, with two of the aggressors, Abou Do and Suleiman, were near at hand; these men arrived with the long rope that form a portion of the outfit for hippo hunting.

The whole party now halted on the edge of the river, while two men swam across with one end of the long rope. Upon gaining the opposite bank, I observed that a second rope was made fast to the middle of the main line; thus upon our side we held the ends of two ropes, while on the opposite side they had only one; accordingly, the point of junction of the two ropes in the centre formed an acute angle. The object of this was soon practically explained. Two men upon our side now each held a rope, and one of these walked about ten yards before the other. Upon both sides of the river the people now advanced, dragging the rope on the surface of the water until they reached the float that was swimming to and fro, according to the movements of the hippopotamus below. By a dexterous jerk of the main line, the float was now placed between the two ropes, and it was immediately secured in the acute angle by bringing together the ends of those ropes on our side.

The men on the opposite bank now dropped their line, and our men hauled in upon the float that was held fast between the ropes. Thus cleverly made sure, we quickly brought a strain upon the hippo, and, although I have had some experience in handling big fish, I never knew one pull so lustily as the amphibious animal that we now alternately coaxed and bullied. He sprung out of the water, gnashed his huge jaws, snorted with tremendous rage, and lashed the river into foam; he then dived, and foolishly approached us beneath the water. We quickly gathered in the slack line, and took a round turn upon a large rock, within a few feet of the river. The hippo now rose to the surface, about ten yards from the hunters, and, jumping half out of the water, he snapped his great jaws together, endeavoring to catch the rope, but at the same instant two harpoons were launched into his side. Disdaining retreat, and maddened with rage, the furious animal charged from the depths of the river, and, gaining a footing, he reared his bulky form from the surface, came boldly upon the sandbank, and attacked the hunters open-mouthed. He little knew his enemy; they were not the men to fear a pair of gaping jaws, armed with a deadly array of tusks, but half a dozen lances were hurled at him, some entering his body even from a distance of five or six paces, at the same time several men threw javelins with all their force into his sides. This baffled him more than the lances; he crunched the shafts between his powerful jaws like straws, but he was beaten by the sand, and, shaking his huge head, as he retreated to the river. Having his ugly snout turned to the river, the hunters had secured the ropes of the harpoons that had been fastened in his body just before his charge; he was now pulled by three of these deadly instruments, but suddenly one rope gave way, leaving but two; these, through the enraged beast, who was still beneath the water. Immediately after this he appeared on the shore, and, without the slightest hesitation, he once more charged furiously from the water straight at the hunters, with his huge mouth open to an extent that he could have accommodated two inside passengers. Soldiers! was valor delight, and equipping they were not lance in hand, he drove it against the head of the formidable animal, but without effect; at the same time John Dee met his happy doom er it be: me, and lit up the scene—which was one of those men do not easily forget—as with the glare of the noonday sun.

Grouped round the flame, and out of range, were our foes—their swarthy skins and snaky hair glistened in the fire-light; and they brandished lances, and screamed with delight at the destruction they had caused.

Dogs were barking, and the horses in the corral neighing shrilly and rearing with terror—some fighting desperately to escape.

I looked at my companion's face; it was very pale, and the expression decidedly ugly.

"Lord," he said, hoarsely. "Here comes an embassador. Good Heaven! look!"

I turned with astonishment: but the sickening sight I quickly fell accounted for Dick's excitement and rage.

A nearly naked Indian was boldly advancing toward us, and bearing before him a burden, which effectually secured, as he meant it to do, his immunity from our shots.

A beautiful white girl of about seventeen was lying helpless in his arms. Her hands were bound behind her back, and masses of coal-black hair encircled a face showing deadly terror and horror in every feature, and dropped nearly to the ground over the savage's arm. Her dress, torn from one white shoulder, showed how her had been the first ineffectual struggle against her captors.

As the Indian crossed the ditch (they had cut the rope which held up the draw-bridge in the first attack) with his burden, Dick, with a deep groan, recognized her. "It is Lily Ross, by Ammon's daughter!" he broke out. "I love her. Alfred, and will save her or die with her. Let me go!" he continued, hurriedly. "This rascal has come to make some proposal to us. Keep your eye on him, and the moment I give the first chance, fire at him. If no kill her, it is the better fate. When I hear the shot I will throw open the window (which I can do more easily than the door), and try for a rescue. But, for Heaven's sake, don't leave the room. Our only hope is in your being able to keep off the others, who will rush into the ditch. Good-by."

And he was down the ladder before I could speak, leaving his hat unceremony adjusted above the parapet. "Save Dick! I will protect the young fried had vanished now! I myself was not in a pleasant predicament. To carry out his half-hard scheme involved my running the terrible risk of shooting my friend's sweet-heart, which at any other time would have appeared impossible; but when I read the agony and loathing in the poor girl's eyes I braced my nerves, set my teeth, laid my rifle ready, and resolved to carry out that no trembling of my hand should mar her deliverance.

And now the savage, a truculent-looking brute, raised his voice, and demanded, in broken Spanish, a surrender. He threatened us with all the tortures his ingenious fraternity are so justly proud of having invented, in case of our refusal, and bid us look upon his captive, for that she, too, should suffer for us. As he said this he grasped the girl's hair brutally, and forced her head. With a sudden spring of pain and fright she threw herself out of his arms, and fell to the ground. His time and mine had come. As he stooped my bullet laid him dead by the side of his intended victim. Dick made a flying leap at the window, and the Indians theirs from the ditch, as he had predicted; but, as Rosita was rather nearer to the house than we were, they managed to reach her first, and was retreating with her in his arms. And now all depended upon me. My first shot, aimed at the foremost of the assailants, missed him clean; and before I could rescue the other rifle he had made a delicious thrust at Dick, who, encumbered as he was, was quite helpless. The lance passed through Rosita's dress, luckily without injury to the wearer; and as the savage drew back for a cooler and surer thrust, I had the unspeakable pleasure of lodging a bullet in his body, which effectually prevented any further brave exercise from him.

Then I heard a heavy fall in the room below. Dick had burst in his bursted door, leaped from the open window, at the risk of breaking a limb, and turning, found himself engaged hand to hand with a dozen Indians. He let his look-a-like dead be still, and drew his revolver with his right hand, receiving as he did so a spear-thrust through his left arm; but his end my revolver, fortunately reserved until now, played among the attacking party, and a man was dropping at every shot, so they drew off. Dick managed, with a great effort, to leap himself through the window, and then fainted away from loss of blood and exhaustion; and when I ran down the ladder to make fast the window again, found him comfortably reclining with his head in Rosita's lap, his latter face more stunned by the unceremonious entry. But I could not stay to help here; my post was on the roof. I hurried up the ladder, noticing for the first time that I myself had suffered in the scrimmage to the extent of a slight flesh-wound from a bullet. The fight was over. Throughout the remainder of the night the Indians lingered about, and stole most of the horses and cattle, but they left us in peace, and again to encounter the deadly breech-loaders. Seldom, indeed, had such a severe lesson been taught them; and when the glorious sun rose (never sight more welcome) we saw them ride hatless off the field, bearing with them five of the slain; six other corpses were lying in front of the window, where the fiercest struggle had been, and two more were afterward found, who had crawled into the ditch like wild animals to die.

We learned from the pretty Rosita, whose gratitude was most touching, that she had been captured while walking in the orange garden near her father's house, a short time before we were attacked.

"You, noble caballero," she said, "have preserved me from death, and from what is far worse. God will reward you, for I can never."

I think Dick, however, was of a different opinion: at all events he has always seemed remarkably satisfied with the reward he persuaded her to make him.

Some years have passed since that eventful night. Dick and Rosita are living at Don Ramon's estancia, that worthy old gentleman having departed this life shortly after their marriage.

I, too, am with them as a partner in the land, flocks, and herds, of which we have a goodly quantity—every Buenos Ayrean among stock of little Dicks and Rositas ask me, as they kneel gayly do of an evening, to tell them a story. I know that nothing less will content them than a full, true, and particular account of the night attack.

THE GREEK BRIGANDS.

We give this week, on page 372, several additional illustrations relating to the capture of which we gave a full account in the last Number of the Weekly—one representing the scene of the capture, at the moment when the brigands surprised their victims; another, the funeral at Athens of the unfortunate Mr. Vlag of Greece, being bareheaded in the procession. The smaller illustrations give the portraits of two of the murdered men, and those of seven of the unprincipled brigands, whose heads were exposed, after execution, in the pillory at Athens, in the manner shown in our illustrations.

SHOOTING-STARS.

A COMET which follows in space the same route as a swarm of shooting-stars must be regarded as forming an integral part of that swarm. It is no profit to form a local concentration of the matter of the swarm—a concentration sufficiently intense to render it visible, even at great distances from the earth. It follows that shooting-stars are of the same nature as comets. They consist of small masses of cosmical matter, which circulate in space, unperceived by us in consequence of their diminutive size, and only become visible when they penetrate the earth's atmosphere. Like comets, or at least like the less dense portions of those bodies, they, too, are in the state of gas. All observers are aware that the fixed stars are visible through a prodigible diminution of their brightness, through the tails of comets. Shooting-stars present the same degree of transparency.

We now now, therefore, enabled to form a clear idea of the nature and cause of the phenomenon of shooting-stars, which may be stated in the following terms:

Masses of meteoric matter, scattered throughout the stellar spaces, and presenting a high degree of diffusion, are brought within the limits of our planetary system by the paramount influence of the sun. At the same time, whether by the same action of the sun or by the earth's planets near which they pass, they undergo a progressive change of form, in consequence of which they are drawn out and lengthened into the shape of elliptic streams or bands. By reason of their extreme diffusion and tenuity, each of these bands composed is far from occupying the toothy of the space throughout which their diverse portions are scattered. Instead of this, it is divided into a multitude of partial masses, a sort of flakes of excessive tenuity, which are separated from each one another, and having nothing in common but the simultaneousness of their movements in direction, and in velocity, by the influence of the sun, for from each other.

When the earth, in her travels through space, meets with one of these streams or bands, a great number of the vapory flakes composing it penetrate our atmosphere. The resistance which this penetration takes place gives rise to a sudden and considerable compression of the masses of air in the midst of which the meteorological projectiles; whence a great development of heat, and gradually inflammation of the surface of the projectiles themselves, if that matter be of a nature to combine with one of the elements of our atmosphere—air. Hence, during the night, luminous trains bolded in the sky, which cease when the meteoric projectiles have been entirely lowered, either by the slackening of these little gaseous masses arrested in their course by the earth's atmosphere, or by the cessation of their combustion in the midst of that same atmosphere.

A meteoric swarm does not, however, finish its orbit at one point of its circuit, and whose different portions take several years to pass this point of meeting, ought to be traversed by the earth every year at the same epoch. Hence the periodical return of shooting-stars. This return does not occur with variable intensity, according to the varying closeness to each other of the nebulous flakes in the different portions of the stream which the earth successively encounters. As to the shooting-stars called "sporadic," they may be the result either of nebulous flakes arriving singly from the depths of space, or rather of the portions of previous streams which, having been drawn or approached by different planets, but still without being absolutely detached from the principal one, which have consequently been dispersed in all directions by the powerful attractions which they have momentarily experienced from those planetary masses.

The resistance which the air opposes to the movement of the little wandering masses which appear to us in the shape of shooting-stars usually produces no more than a rapid decrease of their velocity; but exceptions to the absolute regularity of that resistance may occasionally occur, causing those changes of direction by virtue of which shooting-stars sometimes appear to dart in a serpentine or even an abruptly altered path.

As to the action of atmospheric currents or winds, to which the eccentric motions of a few shooting-stars have been attributed, it is evidently incapable of producing any sensible effect, in consequence of the exceedingly great difference between the feeble speed of those atmospheric currents and the enormous velocity of the little nebulous masses which traverse them.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

"MUSIC on the Mall" is an announcement which indicates that the Central Park season has fully commenced. Last Saturday week was "opening day" for these popular concerts; though blues and magnolias, birds and peonies, peanuts and cancis, swans and ducks, gondolas, mineral springs, base-ball grounds and the like, opened long ago. There is scarcely any entertainment more popular than an open-air concert, where the music itself is free, and all the surroundings are delightful; and the pre-eminence in this Garden of New York City. The recent inauguration of musical entertainments in other parts of the city will prove highly gratifying to many.

The new York Commissioners apparently intend to spare nothing which may contribute to the entertainment of visitors during the summer months. Special bureaus have been organized, each of which is held responsible for the performance of its especial duties, and weekly instruction is received by them and reports rendered.

The Park carriages, in which a delightful drive of between one and two hours is given for twenty-five cents, have become so popular that it is often difficult to secure seats in them. Application can be made in advance. The carriages are very comfortable and pleasant, and start from the Fifth and Eighth Avenue entrances every twenty minutes. It is quite a fashionable amusement, for little people to take a drive on the Mall in the goat-carriages, and, if appearances are a guide, they enjoy it highly. Saturday afternoon is the grand gala time in the Central Park, and the Mall is crowded. Among the spacious house in all day, when one may enjoy almost in solitude the loveliness of the place.

A shocking casualty recently occurred which should serve as an admonition against the careless use of explosive compounds. Benzine had been freely used about the mill, and a spark from a match the vessels infesting the room. A woman went into the room with a lighted candle, and the explosion of vapor was out of the fluid, a can of which she carried with her. The burning fluid was thus filled with the vapor of the benzine with which the floor was saturated, and an instant explosion occurred, enveloping the unfortunate woman in a flame which completely consumed her clothing. It is time that every one should understand the nature of these explosive compounds, and the danger in using them.

Albany furnishes an instance of extraordinary economy, or wonderful ways, of ridiculous attempt at style. A man went to an undertaker to borrow a valuable casket, covered with velvet, to use at the funeral of the brother, promising to take the body out of that the funeral, place it in a pine pine coffin, and return the casket to the undertaker. It is to the credit of the Albany undertaker that he did not approve that method of conducting funerals.

What a pity we can not have celery all the year round! Its delicious flavor and crispness are so peculiarly for nervousness. By a daily use of it, those exhausted by brain and nervous labor, or who are afflicted with palpitation of the heart, are assured of relief. When celery is out of season onions are said to be an excellent substitute.

Learn a little bit of French before you attempt to satisfy your hunger at a Parisian restaurant. An American who went to get his dinner in Paris could think of no French phrase in which to give his order. He only knew the two gravy words, but was unable to put them together properly. At last he stammered out, "Sa'vay, boy," supposing the last word to be that the waiter understood him to say, "il va! femme," and supposing that he was invited to eat a female concoction, left him. After waiting a long time, during that the waiter did not seem disposed to attend to his wants, he began to fear that he must have made some mistake in the grammatical construction of his sentence, he rose again, and this time said to the waiter, "le eau faire," pronouncing the last word fe-ar, as he thought the waiter started in astonishment, and having surveyed the man from head to foot, hastened to the cashier and secured him that the very shortest fellow in table No. 8 must be insane. "Le eau faire" be a scream."

A Mrs. Simpson, of Toledo, has invested in the lumber business. She is a widow, and can therefore be as she pleases, without "let or hindrance," as the lawyers say. She is also very much pleased with her own buying and selling, but owns a canal-boat, goes into the woods, purchases trees standing, hires her men, and does it all in a very regular way. She does not go for advance payments, but when her contracts are fulfilled, Mrs. Simpson pays the cash.

Romance of a sprained ankle. Place, St. Louis. Dramatis personæ, a young clerk, young lady schoolteacher; and a dog. Time, morning. The scene—the dog not yet on the scene—were very properly going to town, and thoroughly enjoying the fresh air. So when suddenly a ferocious dog jumped over a fence and attacked the lady. The young man gave the brute a blow with his cane, which broke it, at the moment of victory fell, and sprained his ankle. The young lady did not faint or make a fuss. She ordered a hack, helped her lover in, accompanied him to his home, procured the services of a doctor, dressing the sight, and next day went for a friend and the minister, and married the young clerk in the evening. The arrangement was satisfactory all around.

It is said that there is a manufactory in Birmingham, England, which still does a good business in making that light of other days—the despised old tinder-box! Who buys them, we wonder?

In not some reform needed in regard to the manner of conducting the popular game of base-ball, or in the instruments used? A young boy of fifteen was killed at Dover, New Hampshire, a couple of weeks ago, while engaged in the game, the ball striking him on the head. This sad accident carries with it a lesson which should be heeded.

One fine morning last winter a planter from the settlements of Florida came into the city of Jacksonville, bringing with him a negro of whom he wanted to dispose. He said he wanted to raise a little cash, and so had brought "the boy" along to sell. Asked $1500 for him. He was utterly unaware that there had been a war, and that slavery had been abolished; and, when told that such was the case, thought that his informants were playing a joke on him, and for a while refused to believe it. His plantation was in the interior, and his nearest neighbor was fifty miles distant, and in all the years that have elapsed since the war's end he had not heard from the outer world, knew nothing of the changes that had taken place. "The boy" was speedily informed that he was a free man, and the plantation master proceeded to consult for him to go, and he himself departed to his solitary plantation.

Thirty years ago Alvin Adams began to run an express between New York and Boston. He did his own driving, and the way-bill on the first trip did not amount to four dollars. This was the humble beginning of a business of immense wealth and importance.

A pound of fried meat, says one who has studied up the matter, does not contain so much nutriment as four ounces of boiled meat; nevertheless, many people prefer the fried—and dyspepsia!

"Harriet," said a member of a Massachusetts Prison Committee to his wife, one night, "which had you rather have me to do, bring home to you $10,000 in money, or a new husband?" Harriet replied, "Thomas, an honest husband." The committee man had been offered by a friend $10,000 for his influence, and he reported the above conversation to his colleagues in explanation of his refusal.

A spiritual medium solemnly announces that the song of "Shoo, Fly, don't bodder me!" was originally composed by the ghost of Lord Byron, and addressed to Lady Caroline Lamb.

Newark must have the credit of getting up the greatest novelty in the style of a church. The main floor will be used for ordinary house of worship; the four aisles and a full complement of pews. But in the basement, which extends around under the building, there are to be twenty-nine compartments or "stage-boxes" for families, each capable of containing twelve persons, with a table in the centre for hats and bonnets. These are doubtless for the aristocratic portion of the congregation.

A revised translation of the New Testament has been issued which professes to be "literal." Some portions of the passages have been rather novel. Mark, v. 19, is translated "The young lady (instead of the damsel) is not dead, but sleeps;" and in Luke, xv. 11, the story of the prodigal son begins, "A gentleman of splendid family and fortune had two sons."

An Italian, who had reached the age of 116, being asked to what he preserved his health so long, replied:

"When hungry, of the best I eat,
And dry and warm I keep my feet;
I screen my head from sun and rain,
And take the cares pipeful of pain."

The New Orleans Times gives an account of "one of the most remarkable events in the history of the telegraph," which is nearly completed in the whole of the Western Union Company, in that city. It has been found that the rapidly increasing expense of the telegraphic profession whether or not it were possible to transmit signals through a circuit of nearly exceeding 1000 miles, and using more than two or three repeaters, with any degree of safety to the commercial business. But a week or two ago a communication circuit was formed, varying in length from three to five thousand miles, and through which messages were sent with great ease and rapidity. The first circuit formed was from New Orleans, on New York, by Platte Cove, New Scotia, the terminus of the Atlantic cable, and return over the same line. The operators, also wholly separated, chatted together with perfect ease, the signals coming rapidly and with great distinctness. Another circuit of greater length was then made up, which is regarded as the longest land circuit through which intelligible signals were ever sent. Seven repeaters were used. The message was returned to New Orleans almost as clearly as it left the battery. It has passed through eighteen States and over 4800 miles of wire.

It is reported that Louis Mohlbach, the well-known German novel-writer, has accepted an invitation from the Viceroy of Egypt to spend a few years in his domains, and collect materials for a book about that country.

Here is a pleasant item for tobacco consumers. In Paris one often sees some person in the streets picking up bits of cigar-stumps which have been cast by smokers. Waiters at the cafés obtain quite a revenue by the refuse of cigars found under the tables, and there are also men who have the monopoly of this trade. The gatherer and purchaser of these bits retires with the harvest to some secluded spot, where a sharp knife carefully hunters the cigar-ends into minute fragments. It is then put into little boxes or sacks or into packets, and sold at a cheap rate. Two or three hundred persons in Paris are devoted to the business of picking up cigars.

The young men of Naples have an opportunity once a year of selecting a wife, provided they can prove that they are able to maintain one. On Lady-day, March 25, the Foundling Hospital of the Annunziata throws open, and all the girls who have arrived at a marriageable age are gathered in one room, where the governesses of the institution. When a young man sees a girl whom he desires to make his wife he drops his handkerchief in front of her; if she accepts his suit she picks it up, and they enter into talk, to signify their intention to the authorities, and to make arrangements for their marriage. Strange to say, these marriages usually turn out happily.

Though not an advocate of "woman's rights" in general, Miss Olive Logan is sufficiently strong-minded to maintain her own. The Lecture Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association of Iowa City having notified her that they had canceled their engagement with her, she immediately telegraphed to them as follows:

"Y. M. C. A.—I shall lecture in your city on the 16th. Make your arrangements accordingly. I shall positively hold you to your contract.

ISABEL.

Sort waves of warm brown hair,
With gold lights shining through,
Shading a face as sweetly fair
As ever fancy framed in air,
As ever painter drew.

Sweet spirit, frank and true,
With love, with kindness rife;
What tender heart but to thee knew!
What kindly eye but in thee knew
The sunshine of life!

Sweet Spring, bright Summer past,
And Autumn come again;
The west wind's spoils are falling fast,
What have they brought with that blast
Why fall our tears like rain?

Only a new-turned heap.
One little grave, new made:
Here is the earth over which we weep;
Never a flower to pluck and keep,
Never a grassy blade.

Silence, where late was mirth;
One mother's heart half-riven;
One vacant seat beside a hearth;
One loving spirit less on earth—
One angel more in heaven!

FOURTEENTH SCENE.—PORTLAND PLACE.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-SIXTH.

A SCOTCH MARRIAGE.

It was Saturday, the third of October—the day on which the assertion of Arnold's marriage to Anne Silvester was to be put to the proof.

Toward eleven o'clock in the afternoon Blanche and her step-mother entered the drawing-room of Lady Lundie's town house in Portland Place. Since the previous evening the weather had altered for the worse. The rain, which had set in from an early hour that morning, still fell. Viewed from the drawing-room windows, the desolation of Portland Place in the dead season wore its aspect of deepest gloom. The absent opposite houses were all shut up; the black mud was washed off the roadway; the wet, level, floating in tiny black particles, mixed with the falling rain, and heightened the dirty obscurity of the evening light. Hoof-passengers and vehicles, now crossing each other at rare intervals, left great gaps of silence absolutely uninterrupted by sound. Even the grinders of organs were mute; and the wandering dogs of the street were too wet to bark. Looking back from the view of Lady Lundie's state window to the view in Lady Lundie's state room, the melancholy that reigned without was more than matched by the melancholy that reigned within. The house had been shut up by the master; it had not been considered necessary, during its mistress's brief visit, to disturb the existing state of things. Coverings of dim brown hue shrouded the furniture. The chandeliers hung invisible in enormous bags. The silent clocks hibernated under extinguishers dropped over them two months since. The tables, drawn up in corners—loaded with ornaments at other times—had nothing left on them, but ink and paper (suggestive of the coming proceedings) placed on them now. The smell of the house was musty: the voice of the house was still. One melancholy maid haunted the bedrooms up stairs, like a ghost. One melancholy man, appointed to admit the visitors, sat solitary in the lower regions—the last of the flunkies, modified into the extinct servants' hall. Not a word passed, in the drawing-room, between Lady Lundie and Blanche. Each waited the appearance of the persons concerned in the coming inquiry, absorbed in her own thoughts. The moment when the moment was a solemn burlesque of the situation of two ladies who are giving an evening party, and who are waiting to receive their guests. Did neither of them see this? Or, seeing it, did they shrink from acknowledging it? In similar positions, who does not shrink? The occasions are many on which we have excellent reason to laugh when the tears are in our eyes; but only children are bold enough to follow their impulses to so strange, in a case like this, a conclusion. The mockery of what is serious mingle with the serious reality itself, that nothing but our own self-respect preserves our gravity on some of the most important emergencies in our lives. The two ladies waited the coming inquiry together gravely, as became the occasion. The silent maid flitted noiseless up stairs. The silent man waited noiseless in the lower regions. Outside, the street was a desert. Inside, the house was a solitude.

The church clock struck the hour. Two.

At the same moment the first of the persons concerned in the investigation arrived.

Lady Lundie waited composedly for the opening of the drawing-room door. Blanche started and trembled. Was it Arnold? Was it Anne?

The door opened—and Blanche drew a breath of relief. The first arrival was only Lady Lundie's solicitor—invited to attend the proceedings on her ladyship's behalf. He was one of that large class of purely mechanical and perfectly mediocre persons connected with the practice of the law who will probably, in a more advanced state of science, be superseded by machinery. He made himself useful in altering the arrangement of the tables and chairs, so as to keep the contending parties effectually separated from each other. He also entrusted Lady Lundie to bear in mind that he knew nothing of Scotch law, and that he was there in the capacity of friend only. This done, he sat down, and looked out with silent interest at the rain—as if it was an opening in the pattern which he had never had an opportunity of inspecting before.

The next knock at the door heralded the arrival of a visitor of a totally different stamp. The melancholy man-servant announced Captain Newenden.

Possibly, in deference to the occasion, possibly, in defiance of the weather, the captain had taken unusual backward step toward the days of his youth. He was painted and padded, wigged and dressed, from the moment the shoes and a male human being of five-and-twenty in robust health. There might have been a little stiffness in the region of the knees; but the upright vice of firmness in the eyelid and the chin. Otherwise there was the fiction of the past century, founded on appearance, on the fact of five-and-thirty with the truth invisible behind it, counting seventy years! Wearing a flower in his button-hole, and carrying a jaunty little cane in his hand—brisk, ruby, smiling, perfumed—the captain's appearance brightened the dreary room. It was pleasantly suggestive of a morning visit from an idle young fellow, who happens to be a little surprised to find Blanche present on the scene of approaching conflict. Lady Lundie thought it best herself to explain. "My step-daughter is here in direct defiance of my entreaties and advice. Persons may present themselves whom it is, in my opinion, improper she should see. Revelations will take place which no young woman, in her position, should hear. She insists on it, Captain Newenden—and I am obliged to submit."

The captain shrugged his shoulders, and showed his beautiful teeth.

Blanche was far too deeply interested in the coming ordeal to care to defend herself: she looked as if she had not even heard what her step-mother had said of her. The solicitor remained absorbed in the interesting view of the falling rain. Lady Lundie asked Mr. Gilmorn. Gilmorn, the captain, in reply, described his mess's anxiety to be informed of everything concerning, in short, only to be indicated by shaking his ambrosial curls and waving his jaunty cane. Mrs. Lundiow was staying with them, and had acute returned with the news. And where was Julius? Detained in Scotland by election business. And Lord and Lady Holchester? And Lady Holchester knew nothing about it?

There was another knock at the door. Blanche's pale face turned pale still. Was it Arnold? Was it Anne? After a longer delay than usual, the servant announced Mr. Arnold Brinkworth and Mr. Moy.

Geoffrey slowly entering first, saluted the two ladies in silence, and noticed no one else. The London solicitor, withdrawing himself to a remote from the receiving groups, the latter, also pointed to the places reserved for the new-comers and for the legal adviser who had come with him. Geoffrey seated himself, without so much as a glance round the room. Leaning his elbows on his knees, he sullenly contemplated the carpet with his clumsy calves walking-boots. Dunbilk, grim and resolute, stood at his lowering brow and his loosely-hanging mouth. The loss of the race, and the circumstances accompanying it, appeared to have affected him more or than usual and heavier than usual—and that was all.

Captain Newenden, approaching to speak to him, stopped half-way, hesitated, thought better of it—and addressed himself to Mr. Moy.

Geoffrey's legal adviser—a Scotchman of the shady, timid, and unsuccessful type—cordially met the advance. He announced, by way to the captain's inquiry, that the witnesses (Mrs. Inchbare and Blanche excepted) were present in the room they were wanted, in the housekeeper's room, and that there was any difficulty in finding them? Not the least. Inchbare was in the house, and of course, at her hotel. Inquiries being set on foot for Blanche's maid, the servant out of the landlady had come to an understanding, and the maid had returned to his old post of bedwaiter at the hotel. The captain and Mr. Moy kept up the conversation between them, thus began, with unflagging ease and spirit. There were the only voices heard in the trying interval that elapsed before the next knock was heard at the door.

At last it came. There could be no doubt now as to who was coming. Anne was expected to enter the room. Lady Lundie took her step-daughter firmly by the hand. She was not sure of herself: Blanche's impulse might lead her to do. For the first time in her life, Blanche felt her hand willingly in her step-mother's grasp.

The door opened, and they came in.

Mr. Pavick, Lundie entered first with Anne Silvester on his arm. Arnold Brinkworth followed them.

Both Sir Patrick and Anne bowed in silence to the persons assembled. Lady Lundie exceptionally treated her brother-in-law with civility, and pointedly abstained from noticing Anne's presence in the room. Blanche never looked up. Arnold advanced to her, with his hand held out. Lady Lundie rose, and motioned him back. "Not yet, Mr. Brinkworth!" she said, in her most quietly merciless manner. Arnold stood, headless of her, looking at his wife. His wife lifted her eyes to his; the tears rose in them on the instant. Arnold's dark complexion altered only one shade: he turned pale. He tried to command himself. "I won't distress you," he said, gently—and turned back again to the table at which Sir Patrick and Anne were seated together apart from the rest. Sir Patrick took his hand, and pressed it in silent approval.

The one person who took no part, even as spectator, in the events that followed the appearance of Sir Patrick and his companions in the room—was Geoffrey. The only change visible in him, since the change in the handling of his wineing-stick. Instead of tracing patterns on the carpet, it now rested. For the rest, there he sat with his heavy head on his breast and his brawny arms on his knees—weary of it by anticipation, and ready to begin.

Sir Patrick broke the silence. He addressed himself to his nieces-in-law.

"Lady Lundie, are all the persons present whom you expected to see here to-day?"

Lady Lundie replied. Lady Lundie seized the opportunity of planting its first sting.

"All whom I expected are here," she answered. "And more than I expected," she added, with a look at Anne.

Sir Patrick returned—was not even seen. From the moment when she had taken her place by Sir Patrick, Anne's eyes had rested on Blanche. They never moved—they never for an instant lost their tender sadness—when the lady of Windygates spoke. And that was beautiful and true in that noble nature seemed to find its one sufficient encouragement in Blanche. As the sister-in-law looked at the sister of the unforgotten days of old, its native beauty of expression showed itself again in her worn and weary face. Every man in the room (but Geoffrey looked at her; and every man (but Geoffrey felt for her.

Sir Patrick addressed a second question to his sister-in-law.

"Is there any one here to represent the interests of Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn?" he asked.

Lady Lundie looked at Geoffrey for Geoffrey himself. Without looking up, Geoffrey motioned with his big brown hand to Mr. Moy, sitting by his side.

Mr. Moy (holding the legal rank in Scotland which corresponds to the rank held by solicitors in England) rose and bowed to Sir Patrick, with the courtesy due to a man eminent in his time as the Scottish Bar.

"I represent Mr. Delamayn," he said. "I am happy to congratulate Sir Patrick on having your ability and experience to appeal to in the conduct of the proceedings."

Sir Patrick returned the compliment as well as the bow.

"It is I who should learn from you," he answered. "I have had time, Mr. Moy, to forget what I once knew."

Lady Lundie looked from one to the other with unconcealed impatience as these formal courtesies were exchanged between the lawyers. "Allow me to remind you, gentlemen, of the suspense that we are suffering at this end of the room," she said. "And permit me to ask when you propose to begin?"

Sir Patrick replied invitingly at Mr. Moy. Mr. Moy looked invitingly at Sir Patrick. More formal courtesies! a polite contest this time to see which of the two learned gentlemen should permit the other to speak first! Mr. Moy's modesty proving the best of the two, Sir Patrick ended it by opening the proceedings.

"I am sure," he said, "to act on behalf of my friend, Mr. Arnold Brinkworth. I beg to present him to you, Mr. Moy, as the husband of my niece—who, for the time being, is entitled to the sixteenth of September last, at the Church of Saint Margaret, in the parish of Hawley, Kent. I have a copy, if required, of marriage certificate here—if you wish to look at it."

Mr. Moy's modesty declined to look at it.

"Quite unnecessary, Sir Patrick! I admit that a marriage ceremony took place on the date named, between the persons named; but I contend that it was not a valid marriage. I say, on behalf of my client here (Geoffrey Delamayn), that Arnold Brinkworth was married at a date prior to the seventh of September—and, indeed, prior to the fourteenth of August in the year, and at a place called Craig Fernie, in Scotland—to a lady named Anne Silvester, now living, and present in this room (as I understand) at this moment."

Sir Patrick presented Anne. "This I confess, Indy, my Moy."

Mr. Moy bowed, and made a suggestion. "If you would kindly put the question, Patrick, shall we take the question of identity as established on both sides?"

Sir Patrick agreed with his learned friend. Lady Lundie opened and shut her fan in unmitigated impatience. The London solicitor was deeply interested. Captain Newenden, taking out his handkerchief, and using it as a screen, yawned behind it to his heart's content. Sir Patrick resumed.

"You assert the prior marriage," he said to his colleague. "It rests with you to begin."

Mr. Moy cast a preliminary look round him at the persons assembled.

"The object of our meeting here," he said, "is, if I am not mistaken, of a twofold nature. In the first place, it is thought desirable, by a person who has a special interest in the issue of this inquiry" (he looked at the captain—the captain suddenly became attentive), "to put my client's statement before Mr. Brinkworth's marriage, to the proof. In the second place, we are all equally desirous—whatever difference of opinion may otherwise exist—to make this informal inquiry a means, if possible, of avoiding the painful publicity which would result from an appeal to a Court of Law."

At those words the gathered women in Lady Lundie pleated its second sting—under cover of a proxed addressed to Mr. Moy.

"I beg to inform you, Sir, on behalf of my step-daughter," she said, "that we have nothing to dread from the widest publicity. We consent to be present at, what you call, 'this informal inquiry,' reserving our right to carry the matter beyond the four walls of this room. I am not referring now to Mr. Brinkworth's chance of clearing himself from an odious suspicion which rests upon him, and upon another Person present. That is an after-matter. The object immediately before us—so far as women are presented to understand it—is to establish my stepdaughter's right to call Mr. Brinkworth to account in the character of his wife. If the result, so far, fails to satisfy us in that particular, we are fully prepared to appeal to a Court of Law." She leaned back in her chair, and opened her fan, with a look that seemed her wish for all of a woman who called society to witness that she had done her duty.

The expression of pain crossed Blanche's face while her step-mother was speaking. Lady Lundie took the hand for the second time. Blanche resolutely and pointedly withdrew it.

Sir Patrick noticing the action with special interest, addressed Mr. Moy coolly as a word in answer. Arnold entered the general attention on himself by suddenly interfering in the proceedings. He looked at his wife. A bright flush of color appeared on her face—and left it again. Sir Patrick noticed the change of expression, observed her more attentively than ever. Arnold's letter to his wife, with time to help it, had plainly broken her husband's influence upon her.

"After what Lady Lundie has said, in my wife's presence," Arnold broke out, in his sturdy, forward, boyish way, "I think I ought to be allowed to say a word on my side. I only want to explain how it was I came to go to Craig Fernie at all—and I challenge Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn to deny it if he can."

His voice rose at the last words, and his eyes brightened with indignation as he looked at Geoffrey.

Mr. Moy appealed to his learned friend.

"With submission, Sir Patrick, is your better judgment," he said, "this young gentleman's proposal seems to be a little out of place at the present stage of the proceedings?"

"Pardon me," answered Sir Patrick. "You have yourself declared the proceedings as representing an informal inquiry. Any statement proposed—with submission to your better judgment, Mr. Moy—is hardly out of place, under those circumstances, is it?"

Mr. Moy's inexhaustible modesty gave way, without a struggle. The answer which he received had the effect of puzzling him at the outset of the investigation. A man of Sir Patrick's experience must have known that Arnold's mere assertion of his own innocence could be productive of nothing but serious delay in the proceedings. And yet he sanctioned that delay. Was he privately on the search for any accidental circumstance which might help him to better a case that he knew to be a bad one?

Permitted to speak, Arnold spoke. The unmistakable accent of truth was in every word that he uttered. He gave a plain account of his arrival at Craig Fernie. There Sir Patrick interfered, and closed his lips. He asked leave to appeal to Geoffrey to confirm him. Sir Patrick assented. Mr. Moy by sanctioning this irregularity also. Arnold sternly addressed himself to Geoffrey.

"Do you deny that what I have said is true?" he asked.

Mr. Moy did his client by his client. "You are not bound to answer," he said, "unless you wish it yourself."

Geoffrey slowly lifted his heavy head, and confronted the man whom he had betrayed.

"I deny every word of it," he answered—with a total disregard of tone and manner.

"Have we had enough of assertion and counter-assertion, Sir Patrick, by this time?" asked Mr. Moy, with undiminished politeness.

After first forcing Arnold—with some little difficulty—to withdraw from the field, Sir Patrick let Mr. Moy's astonishment to the culminating point. For reasons of his own, he determined to strengthen the case of Geoffrey's enemy which Arnold's statement had plainly produced on his wife before the inquiry proceeded a step further.

"I must throw myself on your indulgence, Mr. Moy," he said, quietly. "I have not had enough of assertion and counter-assertion, even yet."

Mr. Moy bowed back in his chair, with a mixed expression of bewilderment and resignation. Either his colleague's intellect was in a failing state—or his colleague was playing a game in view which had not openly asserted itself yet. He began to suspect that the right rocking of the riddle was to be found in the latter of the two alternatives. Instead of entering any fresh protest, he waited, puzzled and watchful.

Sir Patrick went on unblushingly from one irregularity to another.

"I request, Mr. Moy's permission to revert to the alleged marriage, on the fourteenth of August, at Craig Fernie," he said. "Arnold Brinkworth! answer for yourself, in the presence of the persons here assembled. In all that you said, and in all that you did, while you were at the inn, were you not solely influenced by the wish to spare Miss Silvester's position as little painful to her as possible, and by anxiety to carry out the instructions given to you by Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn? Is that the whole truth?"

"That is the whole truth, Sir Patrick."

"On the day when you went to Craig Fernie, had you not, a few hours previously, applied for my permission to marry miss?"

"I applied for your permission, Sir Patrick; and you give it me."

"From the moment when you entered the inn to the moment when you left it, were you absolutely innocent of the slightest intention to marry Miss Silvester?"

"No such thing," as the thought of marrying Miss Silvester entered my head."

"And this you say, on your word of honor as a gentleman?"

"On my word of honor as a gentleman."

Sir Patrick turned to Anne.

"Was it a matter of necessity, Miss Silvester, that you should appear in the assumed character of a married woman—on the fourteenth of August last, at the Craig Fernie inn?"

Anne looked away from Blanche for the first time. She replied to Sir Patrick quietly, readily, firmly—like one looking at her, and listening to her with eager interest.

"I went to the inn alone, Sir Patrick. The landlady refused, in the plainest terms, to let me stay there, unless she was first satisfied that I was a married woman."

"Which of the two gentlemen did you expect to join you at the inn—Mr. Arnold Brinkworth, or Mr. Geoffrey Delmayn?"

"Mr. Geoffrey Delmayn."

"When Mr. Arnold Brinkworth came in his place, and said what was necessary to satisfy the scruples of the landlady, you understood that he was acting in your interests, from motives of kindness only, and under the instructions of Mr. Geoffrey Delmayn?"

"I understood that; and I objected as strongly as I could to Mr. Brinkworth placing himself in a false position on my account."

"Did your objection proceed from any knowledge of the Scottish law of marriage, and of the position in which the peculiarities of that law might place Mr. Brinkworth?"

"I had no knowledge of the Scottish law. I had a vague dislike and dread of the deception which Mr. Brinkworth was practicing on the people of the inn. And I feared that it might lead to some possible misinterpretation of me on the part of a person whom I deeply loved."

"That person being my niece?"

"Yes."

"You appealed to Mr. Brinkworth (knowing of his attachment to my niece), in her name, and for her sake, to leave you to shift for your self?"

"I did."

"As a gentleman who had given his promise to help and protect a lady, in the absence of the person whom she had dependednon to join her, he refused to leave you to shift for yourself?"

"Unhappily, he refused on that account."

"From that time, you were absolutely in nocent of the slightest intention to marry Mr. Brinkworth?"

"I swear, Sir Patrick, as Mr. Brinkworth has answered. No such thing as the thought of marrying him ever entered my head."

"And this you say, on your oath as a Christian woman?"

"On my oath as a Christian woman."

Sir Patrick looked round at Blanche. Her fate was likely in her hands. Her self-possession was visibly appealing to her to compose herself.

In the moment of silence that followed, Mr. Moy interfered in the interests of his client.

"I waive my claim, Sir Patrick, to put any questions on my side. I merely desire to remind you, and to remind the company present, that all that we have just heard is mere assertion—the assertion of two persons strongly interested in extricating themselves from a position which fatally compromises them both. The marriage which they deny I am now waiting to express my sense of this most cruel and unfair way of conducting the inquiry."

The London lawyer followed, stating his professional approval of his client's view. "As her ladyship's legal adviser," he said, "I support the protest which her ladyship has just made."

Even Captain Newenden agreed in the general disapproval of Sir Patrick's course. "Hear, hear!" said the captain, when the lawyer had spoken. "Quite right. I must say, quite right."

Apparently inexpectable to all due weight in his position, Sir Patrick addressed himself to Mr. Moy, as if nothing had happened.

"Do you wish to produce your witnesses at once?" he asked. "I have not the least objection to meet your views—on the understanding that I am permitted to return to the proceedings as interrupted at this point."

Mr. Moy hesitated. The adversary (there could be no doubt of it by this time) had something in reserve—and the adversary had not yet shown his hand. It was more immediately important to lead him into doing this than to insist on rights and privileges of the purely formal sort. Nothing could shake the strength of the position which Mr. Moy occupied. The longer Sir Patrick's irregularities delayed the proceedings, the more irresistibly the plain facts of the case would present themselves—with all the force of contrast—out of the mouths of the witnesses who were in attendance down stairs. He determined to wait.

"Reserving my right of objection, Sir Patrick," he answered, "I beg you to go on."

To the surprise of every body, Sir Patrick addressed himself directly to Blanche—quoting the language in which Lady Lundie had spoken to him, with perfect composure of tone and manner.

"You know me well enough, my dear," he said, "to be assured that I am incapable of willingly harrowing your feelings or misleading your judgment. I have a question to ask you, which you can answer or not, entirely as you please."

Before he could put the question there was a momentary contest between Lady Lundie and her legal adviser. Silencing her ladyship (not without difficulty), the London lawyer interposed. He also begged leave to reserve the right of objection, so far as his client was concerned.

Sir Patrick assented by a sign, and proceeded to put his question to Blanche.

"You have heard what Arnold Brinkworth has said, and what Miss Silvester has said," he resumed. "Is the husband who loves you, and the sister who loves you, here under a solemn declaration. Recall your past experience of both of them; remember what they have just said; and tell me—do you believe they have spoken falsely?"

Blanche answered on the instant.

"I believe, uncle, they have spoken the truth!"

Both the lawyers registered their objections. Lady Lundie made another attempt to speak, and was stopped once more—this time by Mr. Moy as well as by her own adviser. Sir Patrick went on.

"Do you feel any doubt as to the entire propriety of your husband's conduct, and your sister's conduct, now you have seen them and heard them, face to face?"

Blanche answered again, with the same absence of reserve.

"I ask them to forgive me," she said. "I believe I have done them both a great wrong."

She looked as her husband first—then at Anne. Arnold stirred uneasily in his chair. Sir Patrick firmly restrained him. "Wait!" he whispered. "You don't know what's coming."

Having said that, he turned toward Anne. Blanche's look had gone to the heart of the husband's nature at last. Anne's look at her face was turned away—the tears were forcing themselves through the worn weak hands that tried vainly to hide them.

The formal objections of the lawyers were registered once more. Sir Patrick addressed himself to his niece for the last time.

"You know what Arnold Brinkworth has said; you believe what Miss Silvester has said. You know that not even the thought of marriage was in the mind of either of them, at the inn. You know—whatever else may happen in the future—that there is not the most remote possibility of either of them ever becoming in a position to allege that they ever have been, or ever can be, Man and Wife. Before this inquiry proceeds any further, to take your husband's hand; to return to your husband's protection; and to leave the rest to me—satisfied with my assurance that, on the part of either of them, no breach of the Scotch Law can prove the monstrous assertion of the marriage at Craig Fernie to be true?"

Lady Lundie rose. Both the lawyers rose. Arnold sat lost in astonishment. Geoffrey himself—petrified by the audacity of what had just passed—lifted his head with a sudden start. In the midst of the profound impression thus produced, Blanche rose, and, with her head bowed, the torture course of the inquiry now turned, answered in these words:

"I hope you will not think me ungrateful, uncle. I am sure that Arnold has not, knowingly, done me any wrong. But I feel bound to him until I am first certain that I am his wife."

Lady Lundie embraced her step-daughter, with a sudden outburst of affection. "My dear child!" exclaimed her ladyship, fervently. "Well done, my own dear child!"

Sir Patrick's head dropped on his breast. "Oh, Blanche! Blanche!" Arnold heard him whisper to himself; "if you only knew what you are forcing me to do!"

Mr. Moy put in his word, on Blanche's side of the question.

"I must most respectfully express my approval also of the course which the young lady has taken," he said, "and my strong conviction of promise than the compromise which we have just heard suggested it is difficult to imagine. With all deference to Sir Patrick, I think the opinion of the impossibility of proving the marriage at Craig Fernie remains to be established on the right one. My own professional opinion is opposed to it. The opinion of another Scottish lawyer—Mr. Gregory—I have already acknowledge, opposed to it. If the young lady had not acted with a wisdom and courage which do her honor, she might have lived to see the day when her reputation would have been destroyed, and her husband declared free to marry. Who is to say that circumstances may not happen in the future which may force Mr. Brinkworth or Miss Silvester—one or the other—to adopt the very marriage which they repudiate now? Who is to say that intentions which are honestly and unconcerned here) may not, in the lapse of years, discover motives of their own for questioning the assertion now made by the young lady herself? I envy the immense self-confidence which emboldens Sir Patrick to venture, what he is willing to venture upon his own individual opinion on an undecided point of law."

Sir Patrick received the rebuke of approval, and cast a slyly expectant look at his defeated adversary. "I'll keep my promise, Blanche," he said, on his hand, "thought Mr. Moy, "nothing will!"

Sir Patrick slowly raised his head. There was no hesitation—there was only distress in his face —when he spoke next.

"I am sorry, Captain Mr. Moy, to argue the point with you," he said, gently. "I can understand that my conduct must necessarily appear strange and even blameworthy, not in your eyes only, but in the eyes of others. My young friend here will tell you" (he looked toward Arnold) "that his view which you express as to the future peril involved in this case was once the view in my mind too, and that in what I have done thus far I have acted in direct contradiction to advice which I myself have given on very distinct period. Except me, if you please, from entering (for the present moment) into the motive which has influenced me from the time when I entered this room. My position is one of unexampled responsibility and of indescribable distress. May I appeal to that statement to stand as my excuse, if I plead for a last extension of indulgence toward the last irregularity of which I shall be guilty, in connection with these proceedings?"

Mr. Moy's face rose resolved the unaffected and touching dignity with which those words were spoken.

"We have had enough of irregularity," she said, sternly. "I, for one, object to more."

Sir Patrick looked confidently for Mr. Moy's reply. The Scotch lawyer and the English lawyer looked at each other—and understood each other at last. Mr. Moy shook his head.

"We don't presume to restrain you, Sir Patrick, by rules more than three which, as a gentleman, you impose on yourself. Subject, added the cautious Scotchman, "to the right of objection which we have already reserved."

"Do you object to my speaking to your client?" asked Sir Patrick.

"To Mr. Geoffrey Delmayn?"

"Yes."

All eyes turned on Geoffrey. He was sitting bald asleep, as it seemed—with his heavy hands hanging down between his knees, and his chin resting on the hooked handle of his stick.

Looking toward Anne, when Sir Patrick pronounced Geoffrey's name, Mr. Moy saw nothing in her. She withdrew her hands from her face, and turned resolutely toward her legal adviser. Was she in the secret of the carefully concealed object at which his opponent had been aiming all the while? Mr. Moy decided to put the question to her. She invited Sir Patrick, by a gesture, to proceed. Sir Patrick addressed himself to Geoffrey.

"You are seriously interested in this inquiry," he said. "I think you have taken no part in it yet. Take a part in it now. Look at this lady."

Geoffrey never moved.

"I've seen enough of her already," he said, brutally.

"You may well be ashamed to look at her," said Sir Patrick, quietly. "But you might have acknowledged it in fitter words. Carry your memory back to the fourteenth of August. Can you deny that you promised to marry Miss Silvester privately at the inn at Craig Fernie?"

"I object to that question," said Mr. Moy. "My client is under no sort of obligation to answer it."

Geoffrey's rising temper—ready to resent any thing—overcame his adviser's interference. "I shall answer if I like," he retorted, insolently. He looked up for a moment at Sir Patrick, without moving his head. "Ask me the hook of his stick. Then he looked down again. "I do deny it," he said.

"You deny that you have promised to marry Miss Silvester?"

"Yes."

"I asked you just now to look at her—"

"And I told you I had seen enough of her already."

"Look at me. In my presence, and in the presence of the other persons here, do you deny that you owe this lady, by your own solemn engagement, the reparation of marriage?"

He suddenly lifted his head. His face, after resting for an instant only on Sir Patrick, turned, little by little and, hopelessly, slowly. They fixed themselves with a hideous, tigerish glare on Anne's face. "I know what I owe her," he said.

The devouring hatred of his look was matched by the devouring malevolence of his tone, as he spoke those words. It was horrible to see him. It was horrible to hear him. Mr. Moy said to him, in a whisper: "Control yourself, or I will throw up your case."

Sir Patrick answered—without even listening—he lifted one of his hands, and looked at it vacantly. He whispered something to himself which nobody heard. He was whispering slowly in divisions of his own, on three of his fingers in succession. And his eyes again on Anne, with the same devouring hatred in their look, and spoke (this time directly addressing himself to her) in the same venomous vindictiveness in tone.

"But for you, I should be married to Blanche by this time. But for you, I should be friends with my father. But for you, I should have won the race. I know what I owe you. His looseness of hanging hand suddenly clenched themselves. His hand sank again on his broad breast. He said no more.

He had not moved—not a word was spoken. The same common horror held them all speechless. Anne's head turned once more on Blanche. Anne's courage upheld her, even at that moment.

Sir Patrick rose. The strong emotion which had convulsed him for, showed itself plainly in his face—uttered itself plainly in his voice.

"Come into the next room," he said to Anne. "I must speak to you instantly!"

Without noticing the astonishment that he caused, without noticing the smallest attention to the remonstrances addressed to him by his solicitor and by his Scotch lawyer, he took Anne by the arm—opened the folding-doors at one end of the room—entered the room beyond with her—and closed the doors again.

Lady Lundie appealed to her legal adviser. Blanche rose—advanced a few steps—and stood in breathless suspense, looking at the folding-doors. Arnold advanced a step, to speak to his wife. The captain approached Mr. Moy.

"What does this mean?" he asked.

Mr. Moy answered, in strong indignation on his side.

"It means that I have not been properly instructed. Sir Patrick Lundie has some evidence in his possession that seriously compromises Mr. Delmayn's case. He has shrunk from producing it hitherto—he finds himself forced to produce it now. How is it," asked the lawyer, turning sternly on his client, "that you have left me in the dark?"

"I know nothing about it," answered Geoffrey, without lifting his head.

Lady Lundie signed to Blanche to stand aside, and also advanced toward the folding-doors. Mr. Moy stopped her.

"I must request your ladyship to be patient. Interference is useless there."

"Am I not to interfere, Sir, in my own house?"

"Unless I am entirely mistaken, madam, the end of the proceedings in your house is at hand. You will oblige your own witness by not interfering. Let us know what we are about at last. Let the end come."

Lady Lundie yielded, and returned to her place. They all waited in silence for the opening of the doors.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE GERMAN QUESTION.—"Hof some peer?"

If you want to run for office next fall, nominate yourself for president and pitch right into some one with a vim.

If you see Jones at the theatre with a young lady, you'll say, "Hello, Jones, how is your wife?" Jones will say, "Oh, she's well."

Young ladies, always give precedence to age, and never let a young gentleman walk if there is standing room for an old one. Remember to consider it disrespectful.

In the dining-room on gentlemen will sit on the table, nor is it polite to get under it until too drunk to sit in a chair.

At a school examination in New Bedford last week the teacher sought to develop the "general intelligence" of the class by asking them, "What are cows good for?" After a moment's pause a small hand went up with the unanswerable reply, "Well, anyway, what is it?" "Their thoemchik are good for tripe," answered the young philosopher.

At a recent parish meeting a stroll-laced and most pious old lady was submitted a petition to relieve the destitute widows and others who stood in need of assistance from the parish. "Are you a poor woman?" asked another solemn brother, "that you have embraced all the widows?" He said he believed he had.

Mr. Jones was afflicted, and then he told his sorrows: "My dear sir," quoth Double-Jester, "I do feel his terrible bad odder the sad. I als sheraldy catchip code, as that I never did have. I tried every thing bid the world to prevent it; seliber ad widder, it's no use. I've been to Seattle through the Panama ary to Decebber, from the begiddig to the edd of the year, and I can't get rid of the code, for all that. All kides of teas, broths, ad old whibbi dentists have tried, but I'm always swallowed whatsy of it by the by; but it's no use. Dothig odder heaved cud keep by fem with. Odthig but the sad dyig cold."

How does the Empress Eugenie dress?" inquired an impudent female of a bachelor editor. "Generally in mourning, madam, a widow," was the hesitating reply. "Of course," said the female inquirer. "But I wish to know whether she wears corsets?" "I understand you, madam," was the blushing response, "that she dresses like a woman—wearing the most costly garments she can procure."

The recent action of the jury of Wyoming women in convicting a man of manslaughter, shows that the "weaker sex" are sometimes the strongest in justice—but is, female juries will not favor malefactors.

"Ah," said old Mrs. Doosenbury, "having it a little hard, I'm often. But one of 'em, I'll say, would you believe it, I'm now sixty years old, and I only know the name of three months in the year, and them's spring, fall, and autumn. I learnt the names of them when I was a little bit of a girl."

A MEDICAL QUESTION.—Is opening a dead-letter a post-mortem examination?

A lady teacher in the Baptist Sunday-school at Orange county was recently called upon to explain to a "fella," by the story of a child who was sold by the Israelites to the Ishmaelites for twenty shekels of silver. The fellow said he could be seen by the Ishmaelites and bought, it dropped. Upon the teacher asking her class what was meant by the word "sold," the little fellow immediately replied: "It showed he had plaid."

A lawyer built him an office in the form of a hexagon. The novelty of the structure attracted the attention of several gentlemen who were passing. They made a full stop, and viewed the building very critically. The lawyer, somewhat disturbed in the solitude of study, raised the window, put himself out, and demanded to know what they stood there for, like a pack of fools, staring at his office. "Why," said one, "what's it for, a church?" "Fuiz," answered one of them, "I was thinking it was till I saw the divil goin in head out of the windy."

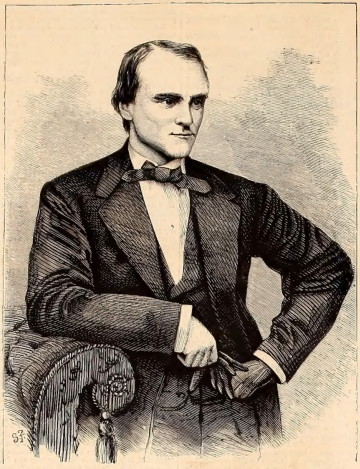
If you want to get a sure crop and a big yield sow wheat.

A gentleman, dressed in the height of fashion, and who had arrived at the Southern Central Depot, in Rochester, from some part of the South, was in the baggage-room, and in a peremptory manner demanded his trunk. He would be driven to his hotel, and attend to all other customers. His manner was so peculiar that the baggage-master refused to be plainly civil but insisted on the production of the check. But he became politeness, and with his turn, he turned upon the customer and inquired of knowingly, "Are you sure you're an ass." The honest Irishman gazed at him in astonishment, and then, with a look of pity in his eye, and what a pity it is that when we two were made bosses that so many should be left dupleat, as they could have per blasted trunk under your nose all the time."

"So you are going to keep a school?" said a young lady to her old aunt. "Well, for my part, sooner than do that, I would marry a widower with nine children." "I should prefer that myself," was the reply: "but where is the widower?"

The secret for a patent coffin says, in his circular: "Undertakers who have used it pronounce it a 'spiffer' and 'jeemer,' and we say you to try it, free of charge, and judge for yourself."

MARK LEMON.—[PHOTOGRAPH FURNISHED BY E. B. FAY, NEW YORK.]



WESTON, THE PEDESTRIAN.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY FREDRICKS.]

MARK LEMON.

MR. MARK LEMON, well known both in England and this country as the editor of Punch, as a successful dramatist and pleasant story-writer, whose portrait we give on this page, died in London on the 23d ult., at the age of 62. His earliest literary efforts were dramatic productions, and he occasionally appeared on the stage. On the establishment of Punch he was made associate editor of that entertaining comic journal, and remained in that position until the retirement of the editor, MR. HENRY MAYHEW, when he succeeded to the chief post, and held it till his death. MR. LEMON was popular as a writer, and a favorite in society. In addition to his contributions to Punch, he wrote upward of sixty dramatic pieces, and numerous articles and stories for the English literary journals and magazines. He also edited a collection of jests, and wrote a large number of songs. Recently he played the character of Falstaff at one of the London theatres, and, according to the popular verdict, was very successful. The stout, massive frame and genial countenance which he possessed no doubt helped to secure public favor in this part, which he undertook rather as an amateur than as a professional player. It will be difficult to find a man to fill the position he so long occupied as editor of the most successful comic periodical ever established.

WESTON, THE PEDESTRIAN.

WE give on this page a portrait of MR. EDWARD PAYSON WESTON, the well-known pedestrian, who has just accomplished the feat of walking one hundred miles in twenty-one hours and forty minutes—twenty minutes less than the time required by his wager. The performance took place at the Empire Rink, in Third Avenue. He made about nine stoppages for rest during his walk, none of which was longer than ten minutes. His chief nourishment was beef-tea, together with crackers, raw eggs, and lemonade. He accomplished the one hundred miles without giving evidences of any great strain on his mental or physical system, being nearly as fresh at the finish as he was at the opening. The first fifty miles were made in ten hours and thirty-five minutes. His quickest mile was done in about eleven minutes, and his best single circuit of the rink in one minute and twenty seconds. The close of his performance was witnessed by an audience of at least 5000 people, who greeted his triumph with enthusiastic applause.

THE EXECUTION OF GOICOURIA.

WE give on page 380 a representation of the execution of General DOMINGO DE GOICOURIA, a brave and energetic Cuban soldier, who died by the garrote at Havana on the 7th of May.

General GOICOURIA had been for more than a quarter of a century closely identified with the revolutionary cause in Cuba. A native of that island, and married to a lady of large possessions there, he was, many years ago, compelled to fly his home on account of his political sympathies, and take up his residence in this country. In all the subsequent movements in behalf of Cuban independence he took an active and prominent part. He was the friend and associate of LOPEZ in his enterprises, though he remained in this country, devoting all his time, energy, and means to the organization and direction of the plans set on foot to liberate Cuba from the Spanish yoke. The failure of the expeditions under LOPEZ and QUITMAN seemed not to dampen his enthusiasm in the cause; and when the present insurrection broke out he was among the first to engage in the war of liberation. As in former enterprises, he acted mainly as an organizer and manager of expeditions from this country. He was recently captured on an island near the coast of Cuba, taken to Havana, and immediately executed.

By the death of General GOICOURIA the Cuban cause has sustained a serious loss.

A HANDY MAN.

In the year 18— there resided in the north of England a gentleman who was known as Sir William Marston. He was one of those men who are cool and calculating—always looking before them. He had made all his money at iron-working; but after having got his title, he thought fit to "sell out" and retire.

He accordingly chose a residence in Durham, and resided there for three years, when he determined to build a large mansion for himself; and he accordingly consulted with an architect, and the drawings and specifications were made out, tenders received, and the work proceeded with.

Now when this mansion was built, Sir William found that every one was admiring it, and artists came and sketched it before the glass was in the windows. Every one declared it perfection, all but Sir William himself.

A very unpleasant idea had come into Sir William's head. He intended to keep a good many valuables and money on the premises. That the question arose, "Was the house fireproof?" The architect assured him it was; the inspector of police said so too; he thought so himself, but he would like to be sure. So the following advertisement accordingly appeared in some of the local papers a few days after the house was finished:

NOTICE TO BURGLARS AND OTHERS.—Sir William Harrington, having a desire to make a free-trial expense in the building of his new mansion, Portland Place, for the reception of plate, &c., to be burglar-proof, but, with a view to ascertain the absolute security of the same, on condition that he write to the said Sir William, and thereby duly inform him how he did succeed in abstracting the same; and be it known, no steps shall be taken to recover the money or bring the offender to justice. But if the said burglar be caught, he shall be bound to state how he entered the premises, and how he proceeded to open the safes, and he shall be duly committed to justice.

A week passed, and Sir William was getting in servants for his establishment, buying furniture, horses and carriages, and all the paraphernalia necessary for the comfort of a mansion. Still there came no answer to his extraordinary advertisement. At last a thought struck him. He put the advertisement in again, adding that "no communication or explanation would be taken to preserve the house from being broken into."

The next day Sir William was sitting in the small room following his office, going through a book, when the footman entered and stood waiting till he observed his presence.

"Well?" at last he said, looking up.

"A man wanting to speak to you, Sir. Says he believes you want a groom, Sir, and a coachman, Sir; hamus a horse, clean a carriage, fast-rate at gardening, can clean up knives and forks, cleaning windows—in fact, Sir, I assure you, by his own account, he is a 'very handy man.'"

"What sort of a man is he?"

"Decent enough, Sir—tall, determined-looking; a kind of man as would knock dander out of you, Sir, or could—"

"That will do: show him in."

"He has a portmanteau, Sir. Shall I take care of it? It might—"

"Leave it where it is." Sir William was becoming the iron-founder again. "Show him in!"

He was shown in, and began to run up his accomplishments, which, to Sir William, appeared very amiable to him. He was just the sort of man he wanted, and Sir William began to think of clenching the bargain.

While they were quibbling about terms they were assailed by a strong smell of burning, and a scream suddenly startled them. Upon hearing loud shouts of "Fire!" Sir William and the man instantly rushed to the door; but the man suddenly fell headlong on the floor, Sir William darting off in the direction of the confusion.

Upon arriving in the hall he found volumes of smoke coming from a cupboard under the stairs, and he immediately ordered in the hall-boy's fire-engine kept in the kitchen (a thing no mansion should be without). He ran up to the cupboard-door, and, seizing the hose in his left hand, he commenced to pump furiously with the right, and the little lever-handle was found invisible, with such speed did it go up and down. The footman kicked away the portmanteau which had been left in the hall, and burst the cupboard-door open, and then proceeded to drag to light a vast assortment of rags, and bones, paper, and damp straw, all of which made a terrible smoke, although no flame was visible. It was soon put out, and Sir William returned to his room.

He found the door locked on the inside upon his arrival; but this did not startle him at first. He knocked, but he got no answer; so, quietly stepping back along the passage (being a powerful man), he flung himself at the door, and it gave way with a crash. The room was empty.

He looked every where, and found one thing—viz., that the window was wide open, and that his five hundred pounds were gone.

He was mortified in the extreme. Had this man who wanted a situation taken his money? If so, was it a plot to do so, or merely that knowing there was money there, he had availed himself of the opportunity and taken it? He thought the latter.

The man that was at the porter's lodge said that he saw a man came in the second time, with a fire with a portmanteau, and that soon afterward he saw him running toward the gate, saying he was going for the fire-engines; and he left him pass.

The next morning Sir William received a letter by the post, which puzzled him not a little. It ran as follows:

"SIR,—Having seen your advertisement in the ——, inviting burglar to break in and steal, I thought that I would try how lovely it would be. I got in, without breaking nothing, in fact, an out-of-the-way proof of the safety of the house, and might with every confidence to show you that Harrison's entry is not the only way of robbing a house. And, therefore, I have the honour to remain your obedient servant, I determined to possess it.

"I accordingly took an old portmanteau, and filled it with some very smoky and inflammable, but not dangerous, materials; and, dousing some old clothes, I proceeded to your mansion.

"As I had often visited it while it was building, I knew it well; and so, upon giving an elaborate message to the footman, I staid in the hall while he announced that I was not able. I knew of the cupboard under the stairs, and immediately upon leaving for the key was in it. I emptied my portmanteau, and lighted a match and applied it to the damp straw and the bits of brown paper, and then I quietly closed the door and left the house, not knowing it would be some time before it was discovered. I then went home and was delivered to your Highness till the alarm was given, whereupon I pretended to help and fall while running for the door; but picked myself up immediately, locked the door, forced all the drawers of your writing-table, pocketed the money, and, lifting up the window, leaped on to the lawn—a good jump, certainly; but I run off toward the gate. Here I was met by Harrison, I pointed to the smoke coming from the hall-door, and I was going for the engines, and then quietly returned.

"It is my intention to indulge in a tour to the Continent, and I shall be glad to receive a remittance by next quarter-day.

"Pray remember they are not all thieves that steal, and believe me, yours truly,

"A VERY HANDY MAN."

Sir William never put any more advertisements in the paper to say where his money was.

"THEY SAY."

No words can condemn too strongly the grossness and more malignant forms of backbiting and scandal. They undermine the fair fame, and bear false witness against thy neighbor," "Thou shalt not go up and down as a tale-bearer among thy people." These are a few of the many admonition of such conduct is concisely and judicially given—for prudence is the outgrowth always of a very few!" "He who goeth about as a slanderer revealeth secrets; but he who is of a faithful spirit concealeth the matter." "Thou shalt not be a tale-bearer are like sportive ones, yet they go with a sting into the innermost of the body."

There is, however, a somewhat milder form of this evil, of which too many are more or less guilty, and which is generally the first employed, sneaking, half-apologetic phrase, "They say"—the sentence being generally completed with some such qualifying clause as "I don't believe it," spoken of. Several friends meet at an evening party, or at a ball, and the name of some one not present is mentioned, and forthwith one of the company speaks quietly, gently, and with professed reluctance, and says, "They say," sure, or solemn disapprobation in the tones of his voice, and the following sentence is one that has a great many bills in the market, and will find it difficult to meet them." Or, "They say that Mr. Blank's business is getting into a bad way." Or, "They say that he is a perfect bear at home." Or, "They say he drinks." I marry him when he wanted." Or, "They say she is very fond of dress, and gets things unknown to her husband." Or, "They say no one cares what they say longer than a month; they can't bear her." Or, "They say she is not what she pretends to be."

These are fair average specimen of "sayings" that may not perhaps be called slanderous, but which are decidedly uncharitable. We are too sorry to look for for the reason of their use. Men receive evil of others more readily or more easily than they believe good. A late writer on morals this sad failing of human nature in the following incisive terms: "Now comes the world with its ear spreads so widely and lasts so long, while our good, kind words don't seem, somehow, to take any wings at all. Many a fair fame in the hearts of mankind these pretty flowers can't find room to grow, while the rank, poisonous weeds of monstar and cayenne pepper, excites the appetite and requires a slice of cucumber with curtain jelly, is but a sickly, unrelishing meat."

The expression "They say"—is most generally used in connection with social gossip. The speak'r in eff... says, "Now, I am not responsible for it; I am not to look for its truth; but you were speaking just now of Smith. Well, they say—and out comes something not altogether to Smith's credit. The speaker professes that he wish to give you the unclean thing as from him, only he carries, as it were, a pair of moral tongs, with which he handles the matter, gingerly, as he has put down the tongs he says, "I am not dirty."

THE AMERICAN ORGAN.

Organ with voice: this is one of the inevitable links in nature. The piano-forte is bright, sparkling, incisive; its clear-cut phrases represent well the movement of instrumental melody, but its contact with that finest organ—the human voice—is slight and momentary. Its tones may be likened to the metallic voices that form a mosaic picture, in which you can have juxtaposition of color only: the organist tone may show lovely contrasts, but they never blend as do the same colors under the painter's brush. But the sustaining power of the organ, the intellectual beauty of counterpoint, these are felt only when the human voice and flowing style is supplemented by the continuous volume of wind instrument. Hence it is no wonder that for social occasions, for musical practice, and for worship in chapels and churches, the reed organ, as it now exists, with its ample power and variety of tone, its appliances for musical effect, has come into such general use. The AMERICAN ORGAN made by S. D. & H. W. SMITH, of Boston, ranks deservedly first of its class, and possesses all the qualities that will suit with ever-increasing approbation. Read their advertisement on the last page of this paper.—[Com.

BEWARE OF LEAD POISONS

In the form of liquid washes for the complexion or mineral cosmetics that ruin and shorten life. There is but one way of removing impurity from the complexion, and that is by removing it from the blood. This desideratum is achieved by HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS and SULPHUR POMADE, one element of which destroys at once the into the torrid circulation, while the other separates from the blood the infectious principle which causes external eruptions and discolorations, and carries them to the surface with the perspiration, whence they are ejected through the sieve-like structure of the epidermis.

FRECKLES.

Or all the effects that exposure of the skin to the air or sea produces, the most disagreeable is the dotted freckle rash. If spread over the entire surface of the parts exposed, it is called tan; if scattered at intervals, freckles. The finest skins are most subject to them. The Ballistan prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., BOSTON, contains a peculiar erasive property which will remove these disagreeable stains. It is at the same time perfectly harmless, allays all tendency to inflammation, and renders the complexion clear and beautiful. For sale by all dealers.—[Com.]

PANIC-STRICKEN BEAUTY.—It is a terrible shock to a charming woman—indeed, to any woman—to find that she has lost her beauty. "Where" she will ask with human being who uses the fragrant SOZODONT make that discovery.—[Com.]

Three Requisites of Health.

If all the sickly people in the world were to take to their beds and call medical treatment, there would not be doctors enough to attend them, nor a sufficient number of nurses to nurse them. Three conditions are absolutely essential to health, viz., a good appetite, easy digestion, and the ability to sleep well. Nineteen-twentieths of the many thousands who suffer from indigestion, yet do not labor under serious complaints, but simply that they "can't eat," that their stomachs are "out of order," or that they "don't sleep well." For this class of ailments few persons think of calling in a physician. Nor is it necessary, inasmuch as a course of will certainly relieve the derangements of the stomach, liver, bowels, and the nervous system, which wout of appetite, indigestion, and sleeplessness arise. These derangements of the vegetable functions are a delightful soothing. Insomnia (or incapacity to sleep) which has rendered all the ordinary remedies will yield readily to a dose of this pleasant sedative taken just before retiring to rest. In ordinary medical practice, there is usual to give a stomachic aperient, an invigorant, a soporific, or an antiseptic, as the case may be; but this bitter tonic supplies all separately to require; but in this grand restorative all these medicinal properties, and many others, are included in due proportion. Thus the digestion is stimulated, while the bowels are regulated, the liver toned, the strength restored, the nerves calmed, the vital principled, and the circulation equalized. It is believed that there is no other restorative and regulating medicine in the world which acts so beneficially and agreeably upon all the assimilating and secretive organs at the same time; and to all who lack the three fundamental requisites, viz., appetite, digestion, a vigorous appetite, sound digestion, and refreshing sleep, it is unfailingly recommended as a specific.

OVER $4,000,000 00
were paid for taxes to U. S. Government during four years by the House of Lorillard. This amount is not exceeded by Tobacco House in the world.
Their Century Chewing Tobacco is now made of pure leaf, ye-dong, and is pronounced by all the best attainable varieties.
LORILLARD'S Yacht-Club Smoking is made of Oronoco or Hyco Leaf, of N. C. and Va., and is among judges as the finest cut for pipes. For purposes ever found, and prepared by an original and unequaled process, whereby the bite and unreal properties, as well as the nicotine, is extracted, rendering it mild and harmless to nervous constitutions. It has a delightful aroma, leaves no disagreeable taste, and will not burn the tongue if a good pipe is used.
The Eureka Smoking is also a fine-cut Brand, long and of beautiful appearance, and very free and smooth; this also has the mild and delightful aroma of the Yacht-Club, and is cheaper in price. Ask these two Tobaccos of your dealer, and any desired strength may be obtained.
As an evidence of the popularity of Lorillard's Smoking, we would say over 10,000,000 packages were sold during 1869, and still the demand increases.

VOL. XIV.—No. 703.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

ON THE WAR-PATH.

On the first of the present month a motley delegation of Indians waited on Commissioner PARKER, at Washington, for the purpose of conferring with him in regard to Indian affairs in the Territories of the Northwest. The English names of the principal men are RED CLOUD, SPOTTED TAIL, and SWIFT BEAR. RED CLOUD, who for more than twenty years has been the head chief of the SIOUX NATION, is a man of herculean stature, six and a half feet in height, and large in proportion. Indeed there is not a small man in the delegation: but in every other respect the sight of them instantly dispels every illusion in regard to the "noble savage" which one may have received from Indian romances. Large, coarse features, prominent cheek-bones, faces painted in every imaginable style of ugliness, are the characteristics of the party. The women are particularly ugly, with pug or flat noses, wide mouths, and big feet. They are all magnificently dressed in Indian style. All wear splendid buffalo-robes, ornamented with embroidery and jewels.

The object of this visit to Washington is to obtain protection and redress. In a conversation with Commissioner PARKER, SPOTTED TAIL stated his grievances in round terms. The government, he said, does not fulfill its treaty obligations; and that supplies promised and money owed are not forthcoming at stated times; and that white men, wherever they can find many buffaloes or gold, come to the Indians' land and take the Indians' ponies and other possessions. The Commissioner promised that these grievances should be redressed, and gave the delegation some excellent advice in regard to fighting and stealing.

While the members of the delegation are enjoying the hospitalities of the government at Washington, their brethren in the West have suddenly appeared on the war-path. Colonel MORROW, who commands the military forces at

"LET US HAVE PEACE."—[DRAWN BY C. S. REINHART.]

Fort Buford, Dakota Territory, communicates the information that the Indians in that vicinity have openly declared war upon their white neighbors, and that they were preparing to make an attack upon the fort in great force. The Indian warriors themselves, who are Sioux, number from three hundred to five hundred, while Colonel Monroe had but fifty men ready for service. Yet, with even that disparity of numbers, he felt confident he could successfully resist any attack which the Indians might make, and also protect his herds of stock. He had sent out ten friendly Indians to reconnoitre, who met what was supposed to be the advance-guard of the hostile band, and were driven back.

Our illustration on page 392 shows a band of these warriors on the war-path, and is a faithful representation of the appurtenance they make when out for a fight. It is their practice, before starting out on one of these excursions, to tie up their personal effects in a careful manner, and sometimes tie up his horses' tails in bad weather, to keep them from becoming draggled with mud. This is a part of the hunting excursions, and is a sure sign of hostile intentions.

JUNE.

Why should I care to count the time?
I know the summer flee too fast,
I know the day has seen its prime,
And I shall meet it in the past.

What if the whole of happy June
Is full of just such days of bliss?
I would not have them come too soon,
I would not lose an hour of this!

The world has made me laugh and weep,
And dreams have been her only boon;
I would give all the world to keep
The gold of this one afternoon!

To lose all memory and all care,
And lie forever at my ease,
Fanned by this faintly scented air,
Wandering across such fields as these;

To need no more—to wish no more
Than butter-cups and columbine—
Nursed by the days that come before,
And happy, if the sun will shine:

To be as swiftly as the grass,
Gay as you brook, and sad know why,
Idle as those white clouds that pass
Across the quiet of the sky.

Beyond the town I catch the wide
And distant gleaming of the sea;
The bay is murming by my side,
The shadows are my company.

How can I wish to count the hours?
To-day is the first happy one;
Too soon to-morrow will be ours,
And we shall call this yesterday.

While all the world and earth is glad
In joy because the June is here,
For me, I can not but be sad
To think it comes but once a year.

THE CUSTOM-HOUSE AND POLITICS.

IF the celebrated traveler from New Zealand, or the planet Mercury, should alight at this port, he would naturally suppose that the business of the Collector is the supervision of the collection of customs, and he would probably surmise that the qualities required in that office are honesty, energy, industry, and capacity. But we should like to hear him make that amusing suggestion in any meeting of any party committee. That the duty of the Collector of New York is the faithful collection of the revenues is a fact which is beneath even the contemptuous regard of such a body. The Collector is, in the political view, the working head of the party in the city. His real function is skilful distribution of the patronage, to the end of the continued ascendency of the party. The question in regard to him is never whether he is the best and most efficient officer, but always whether the party thrives under his rule. The principle of appointment to the subordinate offices in his gift is neither intelligence, fitness, nor fidelity, but party service. The intelligent New Zealander would learn that there is a political ledger kept, in which accounts are opened with certain political men and interests, and that every appointment is charged accordingly. Every clerk in every department in the Custom-house represents somebody out of the Custom-house. And it is but the truth to say that, as in every other department, the main consideration is that the first consideration shall be not the public service, but the party advantage.

This is the system of our civil service. We are not blaming the Collector. He owes his position to the system, and he must do the best he can under it. He must every body say, that if a man has political influence, he must use it, under a proper sense of responsibility, to secure the best appointments he can. It is no shame to a man, although it may be intolerably tedious and vexatious, to stand in the Collector's antechamber that he may presently urge the appointment of some honest and capable person. But it is a sore shame to that man if he does not do all he can to put an end to the necessity of that vexation and waste. And it is a great shame to the country that it does not authoritatively demand a radical reform in a system which, beginning in prostituting the whole civil service to party, ends in the gravest injury to the public revenue and to the national character.

Such is the ferocity of the office-seeking pressure that every body who is familiar with the subject knows how utterly impossible it is for the Collector or any other great appointing officer to master the business of his office. Secretary CHASE was just a month, and the Collector can scarcely do it. But this pressure will, and indeed ought to, continue so long as the present system is tolerated. We do not think good men must press the appointment of other good men as strenuously as unfit men are urged. But it is a disgusting business, however necessary, and decent men constantly recoil. And that is but another imperious reason for abandoning a system which is so corrupting and the unprincipled have so much the better chance. It is foolish to ask the Collector, or any other officer, to correct the difficulty, for he is himself part of it. The difficulty is the system. When General GRANT was inaugurated he hoped, undoubtedly, to be able to disregard it. In selecting his Cabinet he took gentlemen whom he personally knew. He was unwilling to follow the usual party precedent, and the more so he had not been a partisan, and was both unfamiliar with party tactics and the party men, ways and relations. But he immediately found himself, as every President will find himself under the present system, helpless before the universal understanding and precedent. If he had persisted his administration would have been paralyzed before it had fairly begun. The general GRANT, in his last message, spoke more independently upon the subject than any President since WASHINGTON, and deserves credit.

If any other officer attends strictly to his duty, and refuses to allow his party interests to interfere with public service, he is instantly attacked by the party authorities. General BARLOW, the late United States Marshal of the southern district, was one of the ablest, most faithful, and efficient of public officers. During his brief term he saved both the money and the honor of the country. But he refused to listen to the commands of a score of persons who do not command the public confidence nor respect, but who called themselves representatives of the party, and who instantly raised a hue and cry against him. They swore vengeance, not because the Marshal was an unfit officer, but because he smiled contemptuously at their request that he would be their tool, for their own purposes, under the false name of the interests of the Republican party. The President, of course, smiled also. For private reasons General BARLOW presently resigned. But what can be more absurd than a system under which these persons had a certain right to protest? And they have that right so long as the offices are conceded to be merely party prizes for the promotion of party advantage.

It is this understanding, and only this, which has occasioned the late discussion about the office of Collector of New York. The Republican vote in the city and State has fallen off. If the Collector were fit for the office he would—collect the revenue economically and efficiently?—not at all; he would keep up the party majority. Off with his head, cry the managers. It is most Turkish justice. Or if he is to be respected, these managers commend their party to public confidence by asserting that the party vigor with which he has served the country? Nobody but a man fresh from New Zealand or the planet Mercury would ask such a question. Here is the answer: "Resolved, that in active support of the policy and measures of the President and his Cabinet no officer deserves of any subordinate department of the government has been more zealous, efficient, and faithful than the present Collector of the port of New York." In view of the real duties of a collector that is a ludicrous resolution itself. But in view of his actual duties under our civil service system how strictly apposite it is!

So long as we are invited to ridicule and a party administration has an enormous patronage, we certainly do not expect it to use that patronage against itself. But the question of the civil service reform is not whether Republicans are not as fit for the offices as Democrats, or vice versa. It is whether the present civil service will not take the bulk of the civil service out of the party arena. It is whether our political contests shall be fought on principles and policies founded upon them, or a debasing squabble for the spoils. It our great danger at present is not corruption, patronage is both a fruitful cause and fatal effect. We can deal the monster no blow so direct as a reform which would make such a resolution as we have quoted as ridiculous as it ought to be, but is not.

HONEST VOTING.

THE vehement screaming of the Democratic leaders in Congress and elsewhere against the law for securing honest voting is very significant. "Laws against pickpockets should be well considered,' said the gentleman in green spectacles to the philosopher. 'No, you speak like a man of sense,' replied the philosopher. 'I wish you a very good-morning, Sir,' said the gentleman in spectacles; and he departed with the philosopher's watch, purse, and handkerchief in his pocket." There are gentlemen in Congress who were very anxious that the law should be well considered. The interests of political pickpockets is very dear to them. Mr. ELDRIDGE thought that the bill for preventing the cheating of honest citizens by rascals and repeaters was but another illustration of "the ungovernable passion," as if there could be any despotism so hopeless as that of packed polls. Mr. COX said that the city of New York was a Democratic city by the report of a little occasional unfairness in voting there were the vile inventions of an effete press. The purity of the polls in that city is evidently, in his judgment, surpassed only by the intelligence of the voters; and although he did not say so, it may fairly be inferred from the tenor of his remarks that Mr. COX left the corruptions of Ohio and repaired to the shadow of the City Hall and the new Court-house that he might bathe his soul in the bliss of political honesty and an ideal public spirit.

If there is any subject upon which all good citizens should be agreed, it is the necessity of securing honest elections, and therefore those who uniformly resist all attempts to that end must be considered curiously indifferent to the purity of elections, or else to the more serious question of obtaining an honest vote is to register the qualified voters. Another is to provide for the prompt and impartial punishment of "repeating," and of all kinds of frauds at the polls. That there are such frauds, and especially in the matter of naturalization papers in the city of New York, is as well known to those who call the reports of them wild slanders as it is to every body else; and the Presidential election these frauds were open and notorious. They were familiar to all who were active and watchful in the campaign. They were, indeed, so conspicuous and flagrant, and the public indignation was so aroused, that Mr. HOFFMAN, who was then Governor, and who was the candidate for Governor of the party that was to be helped by the frauds, issued a proclamation a day or two before the election denouncing the charges of fraud were "gross and unfounded," and the mere device of the other party. By the frauds carried out Mr. HOFFMAN thus threw the cloak of his official protection he was elected Governor.

But Mr. COX, as we remarked, is of opinion that the reports of knavery at the polls are the invention of the knaves of the press. He mentioned the Tribune, but there are other New York papers, and of Mr. COX's own politics, which have borne testimony to the corruption at the very election to which Mr. HOFFMAN denounced the charges of fraud as unfounded. In the New York World, a paper opposed to the Tribune in politics, Mr. COX may read that even in this Paradise of New York, which has "a cheaper and purer government than Rochester and some others, and "less taxation and less crime than Boston," the editor saw "by what shameless frauds such corruptionists of the Ring as WILLIAM M. TWEED and ELIAS HALL cut down below its level the rightful vote of the electors of HORATIO SEYMOUR." Recently also, we quoted the words of one of the most active and conspicuous politicians of Mr. COX's party, a State Senator from this city, in a place in the Senate, remarked of Mr. COX's political Paradise that "the election system ....has been undermined, and is as corrupt as ....Rome." Surely even of the New York city elections is not beyond suspicion. If the gentleman in green spectacles were a member of the opposite party in Congress—an intolerable supposition!—he would have hotly cheered the noble sentiments of Mr. COX. He would have loudly seconded Mr. BROOKS's statement that four-fifths of the New York merchants vote the tickets which Mr. TWEED and Mr. HALL prepare for them. Mr. ELDRIDGE he would have denounced the despotism which would protect honest voters against rascals.

Laws against the "ungovernable passion" are carefully considered,' said the Worthy Grand Patriarch of Pocket-picking, as he rifled the philosopher's pockets.

It is said that the subject should have been left to State regulation, that Congress has no constitutional right to interfere. It is remarkable, and should be well considered by every thoughtful citizen, that any effort made by the government to secure liberty or to repress political evil-doing is always resisted upon the ground of State sovereignty. State sovereignty was pleaded in every slavery, and it is now urged to defend the most shameless corruption at the polls. But upon the immediate subject, as a matter of fact, the Constitution is the answer of enforcing the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, whether by the United States or the States, is not the question. And Congress has wisely decided that it must now interfere to secure a fair election of the members of its own houses. Meanwhile the law against stealing is only terrible to thieves. If nobody attempts to vote illegally, nobody will suffer. If any body does attempt it, we hope that he will suffer all the penalties prescribed. And if it is despotism to defend honest voters against swindlers, then the kind of despotism is a very excellent thing, and the more there is of it the better.

FOREIGN DEMAND FOR OUR GRAIN.

MR. H. KATES JACKSON is once more out in the London Times to check the advance in wheat, which he concedes has risen "contrary to his expectations." He thinks, however, that the causes which produced the advance are "likely to disappear whenever the season becomes normally genial." As he furnishes the "keynote" to the dealers in grain throughout England, his opinions are worthy of consideration at home and abroad.

So far as the countries are concerned from which England obtains her supplies, it can not be supposed that Mr. JACKSON knows them otherwise than as the appropriate contributors to English interests; but yet his opinions are circulated far and wide, and are adopted by dealers in exporting communities as if they were entered for their advantage. The object of these frequent publications is to produce a public opinion in England and elsewhere, so strained and general that it will enable the English to procure wheat at their own rates. They are stimulated to this by a great necessity. In the competition with the Continent in manufacturing industry, they have the disadvantage of a more condensed population relatively to the land supposed to the cereals than most of the Continental states, and their unprogressive their own laborers unless they can be supplied with cheap food. The demand of cotton spinners and weavers for an advance in wages is now met with the answer that it is unreasonable because there has been an advantage of cheap bread.

On the score of humanity no complaint would be made of this policy if it were pursued consistently with the interests of the grain producers of the United States; but as the latter have not been receiving a remunerative price for grain, it is not to be expected that this shall be continued. Every year we are confronted with a determined, general, and powerful interest, proceeding from the dealers of London and Liverpool to press down this important interest.

We have, from time to time, shown what are the difficulties in the way of meeting this pressure. The English employ their consular establishment to obtain precise information of the state of the crops in every wheat-growing country. This information is presented in London in a statistical form, with comparative tables embracing longer years, so that at a glance the power of each state to export is ascertained. We have no such policy and no such information. The English also, from a necessity to import from eighty to a hundred million bushels of wheat, in addition to other articles of food, ascertain in value in the aggregate to about five or six hundred millions of dollars, spread their agents over the whole world, so that the knowledge may be attained and specific of the quantity and value of the world's production. We have a few branch houses in countries which produce tea, coffee, sugar, rice, hemp, etc., and at great commercial centres, but have no means to arrive with the precision of the English at the quantity of those staples which are produced and sold in competition with us. We can not meet the systematic and effective course of dealing which is employed against us. At one time purchases are made of wheat in San Francisco and neglected in New York, and next week the reverse. Then both are left, and either the Black Sea, the Baltic, or Egypt becomes the theatre of operations. The three or four hundred vessels which are constantly converging from all the four quarters of the universe to England are consigned by those who know and appreciate the views of the English Cabinet, and of the powerful interests which he represents and advances. We have, from time to time, urged upon Congress and the Administration that our consular establishment shall be Americanized, and charged with the special duties which the English devolve upon their class of officers; but, although Mr. SARGENT, of California, introduced a bill for this purpose, it seems not to have been pressed toward its passage. It may be, as we are reveling in the luxury of abundant supplies of food, that we can afford to be neglectful of the means which enable us to make the most of them; but with the heavy loss of taxation which the country bears, it must soon become necessary that we shall not waste our resources.

Although supplies of wheat are expected from other quarters, yet there is more than a common reliance upon the United States. "Combined with Canada," Mr. JACKSON says, "and Pacific ports (California has shipped over one million quarters since July 1) America seems able to forward all the wheat and flour we require between this date and harvest, and prevent present rates advancing." The advance in wheat at San Francisco, due to drought, has already disturbed these expectations. The region along the Pacific coast is less affected than the interior, owing, it is said, to the influence of sea fogs; but it is admitted that the crops will be very light. The farmers are not bringing in grain, from some apprehension as to the results of the season.

It will have been noticed that more than a usual number of vessels partly loaded with grain and flour for sea-ports in various parts of the continent of Europe have lately sailed from New York, which give force to what Mr. JACKSON states as to the injurious effect of a late and unfavorable spring in parts of Europe upon the growing crops. The same influence has prevailed in England, and although the districts from which Europe obtains her supplies are numerous and extensive, many of them unknown in this country, except from the English, it seems probable that the advance will be general in England and here, will be maintained. The rapidity of dealing is remarkable. On the 2d of June an English agent in New York, near the close of business hours in Liverpool, received an order to purchase a parcel of old and sound spring wheat which he had been watching for some time, and before the day was over all the transactions relating to it, including the sale of the storage drawn to a point, had been concluded and announced to the house abroad.

Mr. JACKSON gives the price of wheat for several successive months, per quarter of eight bushels, as follows: September, 50s. 8d.; October, 47s. 6d.; November, 46s. 4d.; December, 43s. 10d.; January, 43s. 8d.; February, 41s. 8d.; March, 41s. 6d.; April, 42s. 7d.; May 12th, 43s. 3d. And he adds, "The next general average is likely to be 44s." The result is a remarkable coincidence between these fluctuations and those which attended the gold market. Leaving out of view the price 162½, accomplished momentarily during the raid in September, we give the highest and lowest rates during several successive months:

September...138 to 135½	January ...137½ to 119½
October ...135½ to 135¾	February...122¾ to 118¾
November ..135¾ to 132	March ....122¾ to 119¼
December...132¾ to 132¾	April .....117¾ to 118¾
	May .....117¾ to 117¾

The pressure to sell gold commenced in September, at about the period when our exports of grain ceased. As they are paid for in gold, which the seller immediately turns into currency, the difference between the September and the March price of gold represented the measure of loss of those who are engaged in purchasing grain in the interior, and selling it at the seaboard. When the sale of gold by them became weak, and the price turned upward, wheat advanced in this market from the strength communicated to our dealers; and the advance also abroad—the latter due, in part, to unfavorable weather. The prospect is, that owing to the fact that our productions will be distributed at a remunerative rate, the trade and industry of the country will stand on a much improved basis.

FUTTY.

IT is not pleasant to read such an article as that which lately appeared in the London Spectator exposing the action of the "Erie" management, with the complicity of the Legislature and of Governor HOFFMAN. That the Governor of the State of New York should be represented by a leading foreign journal, frankly to this country, as the tool of a Ring, and that every American familiar with the facts should feel that the charge is probably not unfounded, is one of the sorest humiliations that could befall us. The alternative was offered to Governor HOFFMAN of becoming putty in the hands of a powerful and unscrupulous Ring, of which the political managers who had made him were important members, or of becoming, with the support of all honest men, a rod of iron to break it. He chose to be putty, and high evidence the words of the Spectator that the Erie Ring had "bought up" the State. It is an instructive fact that this gentleman is the "coming man" of the party of which JEFFERSON DAVIS, ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, ROBERT TOOMBS, JUDAH BENJAMIN, and LOUIS WIGFALL are the going men, or what the boys call the "has been."

THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

By JOHN JONES, A.M.

SINCE the exhibition opened we have had the election of officers in the Academy, and, to the great surprise of many, the revolution was not successful. The reformers were very confident, and we all went to the ballot in the appointment. The vote was very close, and we watched the counting with profound interest. There was no election at the first ballot, two votes made matters more interesting; and we went on to the fifth ballot, I think, before Mr. GRAY was declared elected by a majority of two or three out of nearly sixty votes. The result was received quietly, although we all knew how some of our most respected brethren were busily harassing, and others savagely cursing, inwardly. I say cursing, metaphorically, for artists do not swear, although I have sometimes heard them affirm.

We shall now probably remain quiet for another year. The council is supposed to be of reforming tendencies, but the action of the Academicians is very significant. Those who voted against Mr. PAGE were moved by no personal feeling whatever, for I believe we are all agreed in liking him personally, and in honoring his genius and devotion to his art. But he was understood to be the representative of a policy of censure upon the general conduct of affairs, and his defeat, therefore, means only a disapproval of that policy. So I think that we shall not see any very violent departures from the traditions of the Academy during the next year. For my part, I am glad that the gentleman who annually scalped us in the Tribune is now abroad, for I don't know what consequences the reform, if there be any, might have produced upon his mind. My impression is that we shall have a ricochet shot across the Atlantic when he does return to New York. But meanwhile I will continue my remarks upon the pictures.

Over the "Little Stranger" of Mr. GUY, which I have already mentioned, hangs Mr. CARPENTER'S careful and most interesting portrait of LORD CAIRNS. It is a fine domestic attraction which certifies the fidelity both of the likeness and of the feeling with which it is painted. I think there is no portrait in the Gallery which will hold the eye longer and touch the heart more deeply than this. Besides, there is a quaint and wonderful and homely in the work which suggests a very pleasant impression of the artist, and one delightfully different from the ordinary Academy. I am glad that there's so much superior talent and excellence of execution among my fellow-artists that we so rarely discover the latent GENTRY as Academician. Otherwise, comparing his annual work with that of some of the N.A.'s, I should be surprised that he was not elected the portrait of Mr. GREELEY last year and of Miss CARY this year is still only an Associate. Mr. CARPENTER is not an Academician, and his portrait is not upon the line, while in the next room —well, I mean that in the next room there is a portrait upon the line of a gentleman somebody who is an N.A., and I beg you to look at it and share my wonder. I say a nameless sone body because I wish to address my query in regard to that painter. I confess that I don't see why CARPENTER is not an N.A. as well as some of the rest of us.

What characteristic pictures of KENSETT'S are "The Meadows at Cold Spring" and "Near Greenwood"! In the words of Mr. Punch, they always recall to my mind that line of TENNYSON'S, "The tender grace of a day that is dead"; and that fine picture of WARREN'S called In Bloom, for there is not; but they have the pathos of intense tranquillity, a summer hush, a sweep of delicate but true feeling. They are very sweet. I don't suppose that he aims at poetic effects, as they are called; but there have been far too many pictures in our rooms of late which many of his pictures. COLE, I think, used to try to paint poetry, and it seems to me that he failed. His performance was commonplace. It was suggested, not by sentiment, but by the stock properties of romance—a castle, a knight on horseback, a youth in a boat, and a lady on the main attending. He imitated imagination, which he undoubtedly had when I have heard called "a beautiful eye"; but the eye, poetic as it is, is a kind of test of the G. P. R. JAMES genius that it sees poetry in old armor, and not in old clothes. That sense is a fine one, but I prefer the newer "by'r lady," or "by my halidome," pronounced always "see mee halidome"; for a hero in the next house and in the last fashion it is not easy for it to perceive.

There is a great deal of this JAMES genius among us absolutely, if we give the details without to make a sentimental suggestion stand for poetry. Shall I say, for instance, "Nothing by LEUTZE," in order to be kind to Mr. KENSETT? The shop-windows are full of specimens of engravings in which this JAMES tendency is garnered. He most successfully thus enhances the some picture of a cross in a stormy sea—the idea of which is really cribbed from DORE'S "Dante." The property we have in mind is one of the Sunday-school hymns, which are nauseous by sentiment. But I must not speak of these, or I shall never get back to the pictures. KENSETT is a most faithful observer, and a most patient student. I used to smile when the Tribune denounced upon him the sin of sunset and shirker, who ought to go into the country and study nature; for I remember when I was in Rome how early and late he would assiduously be passed the day before a mullein or a dock plant, and worked away at it until he had fully mastered it. I feel that his sentiment in every part of his pictures now; and the result is a fresh, healthful representation so faithful that the very manner of the work is natural. Refinement in natural form is most shining in him, and his pictures, therefore, are of true quality. They are not poetic, but natural; but that, I suppose, is temperament. It is very much as TENNYSON is called finical and exquisite. I am I not sure that there is not a certain monotony. But where there is a characteristic talent, to complain of monotony is to complain of individuality. It is to complain that a man is himself. Among the flowers in my studio there is a tea-rose; but I don't find it monotonous, although it never puts out tulips. Non omnia omnes. We can't all do every thing. KENSETT paints KENSETTS, and we have no right to expect BIERSTADTS and JOHNSONS from him. On the other hand, I—as the public well knows —paint tremendous battle pieces; and he will be very much mistaken who expects to find me painting a lily with LA FARGE or an autumn glade with M'ENTEE.

OF Mr. BIERSTADT'S "Sierra Nevada Mountains" I can say nothing pleasant. It looks like an extravagant drop-scene seen through the wrong end of a spy-glass. My fellow-Academician ought to remember that by exhibiting every year we submit ourselves to the severest ordeal. If we make an impression one year and carry off prizes, every following season we must justify the effect we have produced, or we shall suffer. We can not succeed upon past successes. It is a man, for instance, delivers a popular lecture this year, he will probably be asked again next year. But if he is very stupid there, he will hardly be summoned the third time. The same fate awaits us at the Exhibition. There is nothing more pathetic than looking at the works of the men who used to paint well, or who promised finely but have never performed. If Mr. BIERSTADT had always painted as he did like his name would not have its honorable reputation. If he continues to do this kind of work, what will become of that reputation? Mr. CHURCH'S "After Glow" is one of the studies of light and atmospheric effect of which he is so fond. It is necessarily monotonous, and in this instance almost grotesque. It shows the skill and observation of the artist, but it is not a very pleasing picture, nor is it new; the sentiment in it which seems to be implied. I wonder why it reminded me of the peaches I found in Marseilles, which were very large and blooming and handsome, but without flavor? They were the mere forms of peaches; peaches de-peached, if a National Academician may indulge in such an expression; and if he may not, I do it in my other capacity of A.M. But it is interesting to observe how far this picture; and others by long wanderings in tropical effects, I should like to see Mr. CHURCH trying his hand upon some of the northern aspects of our own nature, with which he began. He has so much knowledge and such skill that the result would be delightful.

We all miss many of the most familiar names this year. EASTMAN JOHNSON, THOMAS HICKS, REGIS GIGNOUX are among the absentees, and so is THOMAS C. FARRAR, who for some time represented the pre-Raphaelites, and who was regarded by the rest of us very much as the Anabaptists were by the Church. Mr. FARRAR is now in Europe, studying and painting diligently, and some of his works during the last year which I have seen seem to me to show both positive progress, and also the value of that severe drill in drawing to which he subjected himself. When he returns, I am disposed to think that he will assert his claims to consideration in a way decided manner. The Anabaptists of this year are Mr. CHARLES H. MOORE and Mr. WILFORD LESLEY—at least, I suppose a youth is a Baptist. There may be others, for whom I will look. I can not see nature as they do; but I can see their sincerity and patience and ability. But their works seem to me to be as yet studies merely. If they are in the right course, they have not yet gone far enough to satisfy me. I am sure that I feel all the conscience in their work; but do they see atmosphere, gradation, harmony, in it? And are there not such qualities in nature? Unquestionably a landscape is an aggregate of details; but is that fact perceived as you survey it, and can you distinctly give the details without losing the landscape? In Mr. FARRAR'S larger pictures I always felt the want of proportion within the dimensions of the art. I mean merely, that as the possibility of the exact imitation of any natural object is various, as you may approach more successfully than others, that which you can imitate least must be the keynote of the whole. We can imitate, for instance, the texture of the white scalloped mush more perfectly than that of the skin of the hand. Therefore, I should say, we must not do cach as well as we can for that would be sure to result in want of harmony—but we must do each with a full consciousness of the conditions, so as to regulate the relation and proportion of the facts. I don't believe that I make myself understood; but if the artists of whom I am now speaking see what I am trying to say, I shall be satisfied. And, meanwhile, if those who laugh at these works only wait until they get over the well, the roses will be very good for a long time.

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD has given us some fresh and delightful Pacific coast scenery in "Mount Hood and the Dalles," and the "Desert near Corinne, Utah." He shows a decided improvement, and he will certainly use to the utmost every opportunity of his European visit. Mr. CRANCH, too, gives us a lovely glimpse of woods, and another glance at Venice; and there is a promising little sketch of autumn marshes by Miss F. RICHARDS. I should be very glad if Mr. W. A. GAY, of Boston would again show us some of his tender and beautiful pictures of the soft marshes in that neighborhood. Mr. GAY studied with THOYON in Paris, and can do most excellent things. For some reason he has deserted us. But Brother GAY should remember that we are a "National" Academy, and that really good pictures can nowhere be exhibited to such advantage as upon our walls: as he lives near Boston I will not say our metropolitan walls. But I beg him to try them again. We all wish to do better every year. And we shall do so if he will come once more.

GOLDWIN SMITH AND DISRAELI.

THOSE who think Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH unduly sensitive in taking notice of Mr. DISRAELI'S "Lothair" should recollect that the attack upon him is most indecent; for it is an assertion of his personal character. That is something of which the thousands of the English and American readers of "Lothair" can know nothing, and they will naturally suppose that a person in the position of a gentleman like Mr. DISRAELI would not say of a political opponent what he knew to be untrue. It is not unnecessary, as an atheist, nor, as in this case, "a social reformer," to be a gentleman. Mr. DISRAELI plead that if GOLDWIN SMITH and his friends suffered such an assertion, made by Mr. DISRAELI over his own signature, to pass unchallenged, it would be fairly inferred that there was good reason for the charge. If Mr. DICKENS, in his "Edwin Drood," should say that a distinguished American historian, who went to Europe as the Minister of his country, was given to cheating at cards, would it be unwise for Mr. MOTLEY to call him to account? Nor can Mr. DISRAELI plead that "Lothair" is a work of fiction, and that he does not mention Professor SMITH'S name any more than Mr. DICKENS could do in the case we suppose. Every honorable man will understand Professor SMITH'S feeling.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

May 31.—A bill was introduced in the Senate by Mr. Chandler for the encouragement of ship-building. It provides that vessels built in the United States, and registered for the foreign trade, shall be exempt from all duties paid on materials used in their construction. The Internal Revenue registers of vessels are authorized for three years after the bill is passed.—In the House, Mr. Hoar, from the Committee of Elections, reported that Mr. Brooks, no record, was not entitled to the seat from Louisiana, and that Mr. Sypher, Democrat, and an Administration friend, had been duly elected.—The House adjourned.

June 1.—Mr. Sumner spoke in favor of the bill, but a general indisposition to discuss the subject was manifested, and the bill was laid aside.—The greater part of the day was consumed in considering the Indian appropriation bill.—The House spent the entire day in discussing the income tax. The debate was long and tiring.

June 2.—In the Senate, Mr. Kellogg reported a resolution for the appointment of a committee to examine the subject of redeeming the lands on the Lower Mississippi, which were sold for the benefit of the Union Canal Company of the Jeremy by mistake. The matter was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Income Tax bill was then taken up, and the various amendments were considered. Amendments were adopted reducing the rate to 2 per cent., making the exemption $1,000, limiting the allowances for house rent to $300, and prohibiting the deduction of income received from dividends.—Ingersoll providing that the income tax shall not be collected after January 1, 1871.

June 4.—In the Senate, a bill was passed to aid the Texas Pacific Railroad. The International Pacific Railroad, and the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad were referred.—In the House, the bill reducing taxation was taken up. Mr. Schenck reported as an amendment his amended Tariff bill; the House seconded the previous question, but the Republicans of the minority prevented a vote being taken.

GENERAL NEWS ITEMS.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE latest news from Cuba is unfavorable to the insurgents. The expedition which left this city some time since in the steamer General Quitman has been captured. The Lyons landed the men, arms, and ammunition, and the Quitman was captured by the Spanish war-steamer Bazan, and brought to South America as a prize, and then released by Republican refugees on the Swiss border.

The French government has released many of the Communists who returned with complicity in the rebellion of 1871.

Russia is about to absorb the little Duchy of Lauenburg, which has an area of 453 square miles, and about 50,000 inhabitants.

A. P. RUDOLPH.

THE DIAMOND CUE CHAMPIONSHIP.

On the evening of the 31st ult. the most popular of indoor games was played at the New York Hippotheatron, by two of the best professional players in this country—Mr. A. P. Rudolph, of New York, and Mr. Cyrille Dion, of Montreal, whose portraits are given on this page. The contest was for the Championship, Diamond Cue, and $1000. The cue was won by Derby at the tournament in April, 1869, when Rudolph came off third best, beating every body but Derby and Foster. Dion first contested Derby for the cue, but the latter was victorious, and held his title till Rudolph won it from him last March in San Francisco. The defeated party has the right to challenge the victor after the expiration of ten days; but Dion waited, before trying his fortune again, until the cue had changed hands. This was his second attempt to entitle himself the champion billiard-player of America. The game was the common four-ball carrom, played on a Phelan & Collender full-size table (under the new measurement 5½ feet by 11 feet), 1500 points up, counting three points for every carrom—push and crotch barred. The table was located in the centre of the ring, on a temporary platform, and at a convenient distance from the spectators in the raised seats surrounding the inclosure.

The contest was very spirited and close, and the playing superb on both sides. The sympathy of the audience appeared to be largely interested in the success of Mr. Dion: and it is not a creditable fact that constant attempts to annoy and irritate his antagonist were made by the friends of the former. Mr. Rudolph maintained the most perfect mental equilibrium during the whole contest, allowing nothing to throw him off his guard, and playing the exhausting game through to the end without once resorting to the aid of stimulants. He won by 13 points. The following is the score in full:

Rudolph....9, 0, 20, 27, 6, 0, 3, 37, 0, 1, 111, 9, 3, 6, 3, 66, 6, 13, 66, 106, 13, 3, 6, 9, 19, 3, 94, 3, 3, 6, 9, 1, 75, 24, 1, 9, 6, 9, 3, 1, 45, 111, 153, 51, 153, 4, 3, 6, 9, 0, 15, 45, 18, 126.
Dion....0, 3, 18, 40, 3, 7, 1, 10, 6, 3, 3, 3, 3, 6, 3, 3, 21, 34, 1, 10, 171, 3, 30, 54, 6, 33, 9, 70, 10, 10, 10, 64, 6, 9, 90, 48, 180, 0, 159, 12, 0, 3, 57, 0, 18, 48, 15, 6, 3, 36, 0, 15, 126.
Rudolph's best run ... 153	Dion's best run ... 171
Dion's best run ... 171	Rudolph's best run ... 153
Rudolph's average... 57	Dion's average ... 57

This was by far the most exciting and most closely contested game of billiards ever played in this city; and though Mr. Rudolph retains the Diamond Cue, so honorably won in two contests, it is apparent that there is little difference between his playing and that of Mr. Dion. Both appear to be equally masters of the game.

DUST AND DISEASE.

It was long believed that epidemic diseases were propagated by malaria, which consisted of organic matter in a state of motor-decay; that when such matter was taken into the body, through the lungs or the skin, it had the power of spreading in it a similar decay—what was a case in point. Why should not a bit of malicious matter operate in the body as a little leaven, leavening the whole lump? The air of all large cities is filled with organic dust, which only needs a sufficiently powerful beam of light, striking into a darkened room, to make the air appear as a semi-solid rather than a gas. This all-pervading dust is extremely injurious to health. Dr. Tyndall, of London, has invented a simple respirator—a handful of cotton wool—with which some interesting experiments may be made. Empty the lungs as far as possible, and then inhale a deep breath through a little cotton wool held against the mouth, and on breathing out this air, through a tube, it cuts a black line through the sunbeam, showing that the air is perfectly free from particles of dust. The cotton wool has completely intercepted the floating matter on its way to the lungs; and as no dust was inhaled, none was exhaled. Here, then, is the philosophy of an instinctive habit of medical men. In a contagious atmosphere the physician puts his handkerchief to his mouth, and inhales through it: in short, he keeps back the floating germs. If the poison were a gas it could not be thus intercepted. But cotton wool is the best and surest filter, and a physician who wants to hold back from the lungs of his patient, or from his own lungs, the germs by which contagious disease is said to be propagated, will employ a cotton wool respirator. Such respirators should come into general use as a defense against contagion. In crowded dwellings, where the isolation of the sick is difficult, if not impossible, the noxious air around the patient may by this simple means be restored to practical purity. Thus filtered, attendants may breathe the air unharmed. In all probability the protection of the lungs will be the protection of the entire system. For it is exceedingly probable that the germs which lodge in the air-passages, and which, at their leisure, can work their way across the mucous membrane, are those which sow in the body epidemic disease. If this be so, then disease can certainly be warded off by filters of cotton wool.

CHAPTER VII.

Alarming News.—"The Base."—Hatred Inspired by them.—Uncertainty of their Origin.—Their Type.—We shun their Territory.—The Watch.—We surprise a Rhinoceros.—Value of the Rhinoceros, Hide, and Horns.—Small Birds.—Cunning of the Crocodile.

WE returned to camp late in the evening, and I found the howartis had secured the crocodile of yesterday; but the whole camp was anxious to return to the camp at Delhdilin, as unpleasant reports were brought into our camp by spies, who had seen parties of the Basé in several directions.

When, wishing to explore the Settite, which traverses the country of the Basé, I had endeavored to procure all the information possible concerning this province, I had received but one answer—that it was a wild and ferocious country, inhabited by a ferocious race, whose hand was against every man, and who, in return, were the enemies of all by whom they were surrounded; nevertheless, safe in their mountain strong-hold, they defied all adversaries.

The Basé is a portion of Abyssinia, but the origin of the tribe that occupies this inaccessible hornet's nest is unknown. Whether they are the remnant of the original Ethiopians, who possessed the country prior to the conquests of the Abyssinians, or whether they are descended from the woolly haired tribes of the south banks of the Blue Nile, is equally a mystery; all we know is that they are of the same type as the inhabitants of Fazoglé, of the upper portion of the Blue River; they are exceedingly black, with woolly hair, resembling in that respect the negro, but without the flat nose or prognathous jaw. No quarter is given on either side should the Basé meet the Arabs, with whom war is to the knife. In spite of the overwhelming superiority of their adversaries, the Basé can not be positively subdued; armed with the lance as their only weapon, but depending upon extreme agility and the natural difficulties of their mountain passes, the attack of the Basé is always by stealth; their spies are ever prowling about unseen, like the leopard, and their onset is invariably a surprise; success or defeat is alike followed by a rapid retreat to their mountains.

As there is nothing to be obtained by the plunder of the Basé but women and children as slaves, the country is generally avoided, unless visited for the express purpose of a slave razzia. In this case no quarter is given on either side; it is war to the death.

My aggagoers certainly were not afraid of the Basé. Had it been necessary to attack legions of them, Abou Do, Taher Noor, and Suleiman would have fallen upon them, sword in hand, with real joy; but the rest of the band were greatly disturbed. The Tokrooris themselves, though brave enough in some respects, were far from tranquil.

As I had almost finished the explorations I intended to make in these parts, it was decided that we should break up the camp in a few days and return to our previous bivouac. This sufficed to calm the anxiety.

CLOSE QUARTERS WITH A LION.

Before my departure I made up my mind to have one more day's hunting in the neighborhood.

Within three hundred yards of the camp was a regular game path, by which the animals arrived at the river to drink every morning from seven to nine. I had shot several tétel and ariel by simply waiting behind a rock at this place. I once more concealed myself, and was shortly rewarded by the arrival of several herds, including nellut (A. Strepsiceros), tétel (A. Tiddalia), ariel

THE DYING LIONESS.

(G. Dama), the black striped gazelle (G. Dorcas), the small oterop (Colotragus Mesiaus); and, among these, two ostriches. I had seen very few ostriches in this country. I now had a good chance, as the herd of animals returned from drinking, by charging at full speed up the steep bank from the water, and they passed about twenty yards from my hiding-place, headed by the ostriches. Having the little Fletcher, I was suddenly tempted to fire a right and left, so as to bag my ostrich with one barrel, and a wild-fowl with the other. Both fell for an instant; the bird dead, shot through the neck; but my ostrich was that a fine cock bird, immediately recovered, and went off with his wife as hard as their long legs could carry them. I was completely disgusted. I had evidently fired too far behind, not having allowed sufficiently for the pace and direction of their flight. However, to make amends, I snatched a spare single-rifle from one of the men, and knocked over another wild fowl—and the last of the herd. For about an hour I attempted to follow up the tracks of the ostrich, but among the rocky hills this was impossible. I therefore mounted Aggidar, and with my trackers, Tather Noor, and the Tokrooris as gun-bearers, I crossed the river and rode straight into the interior of the country. This was my favourite hunting ground, as the game was generally plentiful. Dismounting, I gave them the horse, and, accompanied by Tather Noor, I began to work to look the animal; and perceiving him beneath a tree within fivepaces, I took a steady shot behind the point of the shoulder. The instant that I fired he winked sharply round, and looked upon all sides in the utmost confusion. I saw that he was severely wounded, as he walked slowly; and upon my arrival at a little spreading mimosa he lay down. We now advanced toward the tree, and I sent Tather Noor round to the other side in order to give the attention should he rise to the rise. This he quickly proved by springing up as I advanced. Accordingly, I hailed my tracker. Noor had taken his stand about eighty paces beyond the tree. The rhinoceros now turned and faced him. This gave me the opportunity that I had expected, and I ran quickly to within thirty yards, just in time to obtain a good unobstructed shot, as, hearing my footsteps, he turned toward me. Whirl! whirl! and he charged vigorously upon the wind. I sent a bullet through the base remaining barrel, he ran round and round in a narrow circle, uttering a short, shrill cry of pain, fell heavily upon his side. I threw a stone at him, but he was already dead. The hide of the rhinoceros is exceedingly easy to detach from the body, as the quality is so hard and stiff that it separates from the flesh like the parts of a gun-carriage. In a couple of hours it had been detached in section for shields, and sufficient flesh was hacked from the canal, together with the delicious-looking hend, which was secured by ropes upon the saddle.

A rhinoceros hide furnishes material for seven shields. A piece large enough for this purpose is sold for about two dollars. The horns of the same animal are likewise sold for two dollars a pound in Abyssinia, where they are much used for sword-hilts.

I returned slowly, following the river. The banks were overgrown with small bush, and strong the bushes (a species of willow) grew by the water's edge. The weight of a single flock beside the river no slender branch until they touch the water. This is their opportunity for drinking, as their beaks for an instant touch the stream. These unfortunate little birds get no rest; the large fish and the crocodile prey upon them when they attempt to drink, while the falcons and hawks pounce them at all times, in every direction.

Few creatures are so sly and wary as the crocodile. I watch them continually as they attack the dense flocks of small birds that throng the bushes at the water's edge. These birds are perfectly aware of the danger, and keep a look-out for the attack if possible. The crocodile then quietly and innocently lies upon the surface, as though it had apparently quite by an accident, and thus attracts the attention of the birds, and it slowly sails away in a considerable distance, exposed to their view. The birds, thus beguiled by the deceiver, believe that the danger is removed, and they again flock to the bank, and once more dip their thirsty beaks into the stream. Thus absorbed in slaking their thirst, they do not observe that their enemy is no longer on the surface. A sudden splash, followed by a huge pair of jaws bursting from the bush that projects the centre of victims, is the signal unexpectedly given of the destruction of scores, who into the water, and hastened under cover of water to his victims. I have seen the crocodiles repeat this manœuvre constantly; they descend to a fresh retreat, and then attack from below.

In like manner the crocodile preserves, while it is floating on the surface in mid-stream, or from the opposite side of the river, a woman filling her girba, or an animal drinking, etc., etc. Sinking immediately, it swims perhaps a hundred yards under water, and again appearing for an instant upon the surface, it assures itself of the position of its prey by a stealthy look; once more it sinks, and reaches the same spot upon which the person or animal may be. Seeing distinctly through the water, it generally makes its first fatal rush from beneath, sometimes seizing with its jaws, and at other times striking the object into the water with its tail, after which it is seized and carried off.

The crocodile does not attempt to swallow a large prey at once, but generally carries it away, and keeps it for a considerable time in its jaws in some deep hole beneath a rock or the root of a tree, where it eats it at leisure.

At Dellediffa.—No Aggagers.—Neighboring Forest.—Tracks of a Lion around the Camp.—Search for the Lion's Haunt.—Two Lions Started at One, and no Rifle.—Death of a Lioness.—Beauty of the Country.—Difficulty of Water.—Fine Scenery.—A Lion seeks to make his Way Into the Camp.—Pursuit of the Lion.—Terrific Fight Face to Face with the Lion.

THE next day we returned to Dellediffa, where we found every thing as we had left it, except that I had no more aggagers. The Sheref of Dellediffa, however, was to agree with Abon Do, had gone, and were hunting on the banks of the River, while I was to remain and guard the Settie. As to the two others, they had ridden so recklessly on unnecessary occasions that all their horses were knocked up and incapable of hunting. My three horses, having been well cared for, were in excellent condition. Abon Do coolly proposed that I should lend them to him, which I, of course, refused, as I had a long journey before me. This led to disagreement, and I ordered him and his people to leave my camp, and to return home. This was no reason to complain. During the time they had been with me they had sent to Geera, on their own account, for their own horses, and for their hides, fat, and dried meat. They had also had the greater portion of my flour. Never had they been so profitable an expedition.

While the men were engaged in pitching the tents and arranging the camp, I took my double-barreled small rifle, and, with Tather Noor as my sole companion, I started in search of game, expecting to obtain a shot at a reedbuck within a quarter of a mile. The ground was sandy but thinly timbered, and there was no grass. Noor and as the forest was bounded on two sides by the river, and separated from it by a narrow belt of high grass, I thought that I could cut the country of grass had spread this portion, which was an average for all kinds of game, in a state of luxuriance and cover. It was a buffalo that I killed instead of an antelope. My men sent to work to cut the animal up, and to carry the meat to the camp, while I continued my search for game. Before leaving I had given orders to leave the carcass and a portion of the meat as a bait for the lions, with which the neighborhood abounded, although it was exceedingly difficult to see them, as they were so thoroughly in keeping with the subdue bush. I was fully resolved to track the lions, should, if the thing were possible in a region so favorable to them.

That night we were serenaded by the roaring of three animals, which appeared to be lions having visited our camp, around which we discovered the footprints in the following morning. I accordingly took Tather Noor, with Haaji Ali and Hassan, two of my trusty Tokrooris, and started straight for the river, which was the direct cess of the buffalo. As I had expected, nothing remained—not even a bone. The ground was much trampled, and tracks of lions were upon the sand; but the body of the buffalo had been dragged into the thorny jungle. It was impossible, if possible, to get a shot; therefore I followed carefully the track left by the carcass, which led forward in the withered grass. Unfortunately the lions had dragged the buffalo down wind; therefore, after I had entered within the thick bubbak and high grass, I came to the conclusion that my only chance would be to follow a line parallel to the wind, and to cut through the thorns, until I should be advised by my eyes of the position of the lions. Of course I would by this time be in a state of putrefaction, and the lions would most probably be with the body. Accordingly, I took a line to the left, and continuing straight forward for some hundred yards, I again struck into the thick bush, which in the thick bubbak and high grass, I came to the conclusion that my only chance would be to follow a line parallel to the wind, and to cut through the thorns, until I should be advised by my eyes of the position of the lions. Of course I would by this time be in a state of putrefaction, and the lions would most probably be with the body. Accordingly, I took a line to the left, and continuing straight forward for some hundred yards, I again struck into the thick bush, which came round to the wind. Success depended on extreme caution; therefore I advised my three men to keep close behind me with their spare rifles, as I carried my single-barreled Beatie, and in this manner we proceeded very slowly. I had chosen it for this close work, when I expected to get a shot at the eye or forehead of a lion, should he charge. The bush was full, with difficulty I crept forward, followed closely by my men, through the tangled growth, which formed the dense mimosa bubbak bushes; peering through the thick covert, with the nerves tuned up to full pitch, and the finger on the trigger ready for any emergency. We had thus advanced for about half an hour, during which I frequently applied my mouth to within a foot of the ground to catch the scent, when a sudden puff of wind brought the unmistakable smell of the decomposing flesh. For the moment I halted, and, looking round to my men, I made a sign that we were close upon the lions. Every one of my men were to be ready with the rifles. Again I crept gently forward, bending, and sometimes crawling, through the thorns to avoid the slightest noise. As I approached, the smell became stronger, and I at length felt that I was close to the cause. This was highly exciting. Fully prepared for a quick shot, I cautiously crept on. I was suddenly arrested by a dense thorns within a few feet of me suddenly brought my rifle to my shoulder—almost in the same instant I observed the three-quarter figure of either a lion or a lioness within three yards of me, with her head to the bush and her shoulder to me. I had been creeping—the foliage concealed the beast, but I could almost have touched the shoulder with my rifle. Instantly I pressed upon the bullet; and I fired exactly through the centre of the shoulder. Another tremendous roar! and a crash in the bushes, as the animal made a bound forward, was succeeded immediately by a similar roar, as another lion took the exact position of the last, and stood over the carcass in front of the rifle, and seeking for the cause of the intrusion. This was a great lion with a shaggy mane; but I was unloaded, keeping my eyes fixed on the beast, while I stretched my hand back for a spare rifle; the lion remained standing, but gazing up wind with his head raised, snuffing in the air for a scent of the enemy. No rifle was put into my hand. I looked back for an instant, and saw my Tokrooris faltering, about five yards behind me. I looked daggers at them, gnashing my teeth and shaking my fist. They saw the lion, and Tather Noor snatching a rifle from Haaji Ali, gave it to me. I took it, and as Hassan, ashamed, ran forward—the lion disappeared at the same moment! Never was such a fine chance lost through the indecision of the gun-bearers! I made a vow never to carry a single-barreled rifle again when hunting large game. If I had had my dear little Fletcher, I should have nailed the lion to a certainty.

However, there was not much time for reflection—where was the first lion? Some remains of the buffalo lay about my right, and I expected to find the lion, most probably crouching in the thorns somewhere near us. Having reloaded, I took one of my Beatie No. 10 rifles, and listened attentively for a sound. Presently I heard a grunt a few yards in my front. Tather Noor drew his sword, and, with his shield before him, he searched for the lion, while I crept forward toward the sound that was again reported. A loud roar, accompanied by a rush in the jungle, and the lioness sprang out to the left in front of within ten or twelve yards; but I had no chance to fire. Again the lion growl was repeated, and, step after step creeping toward the spot, I saw a splendid animal crouched upon the ground among the withered and broken grass. The lioness lay dead with the bullet wound in the shoulder. Occasionally, in her rage, she bit her own paw violently, and then struck and clawed the ground. A pool of blood by by her side. She was then about ten yards from us, and I was preparing to throw a clod of earth at her (there were no stones), to prove whether she was dead, when I caught sight of the cubs. She merely replied with a dull roar, and I remarked her misery by a ball through the head. She was a beautiful animal, and the effect of the bullet was sticking in the wound; she was shot through both shoulders, and as we were not far from the tent, I determined to have her brought to camp upon a camel as an offering to my wife. Accordingly I left Tather Yakcoorie, while I went with Tather Noor to fetch a camel.

On our road through the thick jungle I was disturbed by a noise close to me: for the moment I thought it was a lion, but almost at the same instant I saw a fine male ostrich within ten paces of me, and I killed it immediately with a bullet through the back of the neck. This was great luck, and we were much rejoiced to obtain, as in a few shots I had killed a lioness and a rellet.

We remounted, and came to the scene of our delightful camp at Dellediffa. Above the camp the river was extremely picturesque; with high mountains and steep cliffs covered with dark tamarind trees, or with their granite cliffs covered with the purple cactus of the desert, and altogether this solitude coursed the limpid waters of the Settie. The country swarmed with game. It would be impossible to enumerate all my exciting hunting expeditions in this region. My Arabs, who had left the position reserved, formerly made their fortunes. Not only did large game abound, but all sorts, elephants, hippopotami, rhinoceros, buffaloes, giraffes, and antelopes.

As our camp was full of meat, we had been a great attraction to the beasts of prey, who continually approached under our thin fences during the night. One night in particular, a lion attempted to enter, but was prevented by the dogs. Tokrooris, who pelted him with fire-brands; my people woke me up and begged me to shoot him, but, as it was impossible to see him as he crouched through the hedge of thorns, I refused to be disturbed, but promised to look for him on the following day. Throughout the entire night the lion prowled around the camp, growling and attempting to force his way in. Not one of my people slept, as they declared he would bound into the centre of the camp. Numerous fires were kept up the watch-fires are drove him away with brands. The next day, before sunrise, I collected my people, and with whom I accompanied by upon their crowvaise on a former occasion, and I crossed the river in order to follow up the dead. I intrusted them with two rifles, and, with my little Fletcher in hand, I determined to search the bushes by the scorching every thicket of the forest for lions, as I felt convinced that the animal was lying severely wounded in the spot we soon concealed somewhere within the neighboring jungle.

Thick jungle has passed fruitlessly; I had crept through the thickest thorns in vain; having abundance of meat, I had ordered the camel to be prepared with the saddle and large antelopes, as I had devoted myself exclusively to lions. It was the afternoon, and as the evening had arrived without a shot having been fired; and, as the sun had nearly set, I ordered a halt to search the ground, having through alternate open glades of a few yards width, hemmed in on all sides by thick jungle. I was cautiously observing my men upon my shoulder, as I pushed my way through the opposing thorns, when a sudden roar just before me at once brought the rifle upon full cock, and I saw a magnificent lion standing in the middle of the glade, about ten yards from me. He had been lying on the ground, and had started by his fast upon hearing the approach through the jungle. For an instant he stood in an attitude of attention, as we were hardly visible; but, as the same moment, I took a quick but sure shot with the little Fletcher. He gave a convulsive bound, but rolled over backward; before he could recover himself I fired the left hand barrel. It was a glorious sight. I had advanced a few steps into the glade, and Hassan had quickly handed me a spare rifle, while Tather Noor stood by me, armed in hand. The lion, in the greatest fury, with his shaggy mane bristled in the air, gnawed with death-like growls, as open-mouthed he endeavored to charge upon us; but he dragged his hind-quarters through the ground, and was immediately that the little Fletcher had broken his spine. In his tremendous exertions to attack, he tilted over and over, grinding his terrible jaws, and tearing holes in the sandy ground at each blow of his tremendous paws, that would have made a man's skull like an egg-shell. Seeing that he was hors de combat, I took it coolly, as I reserved dusk, and the lion was being rolled into a dark and thick bush, I thought it would be advisable to defer the final attack, as he would, in all probability, be dead when morning.

On the following morning, before sunrise, I started, with nearly all my people and a powerful camel, with the intention of bringing the lion home entire. I recite my horse Tigre, who had frequently shown great courage, and I wished to prove whether he would advance to the body of the lion.

Upon arrival near the spot which we supposed to have been that of the encounter, we were rather puzzled, as there was nothing to distinguish the locality; one place exactly resembled another, as the country was flat and sandy, interspersed with thick jungle of green bubbak. I accordingly spread out to beat for the lion. Presently Haaji Ali cried out: "There he lies, dead!" and I immediately rode to the spot, to gather the people. A tremendous roar greeted us, as the lion started to his fore-feet; and, with his head low down over, and his great hazel eyes flashing fire, he gave a succession of deep, short roars, and challenged us to fight. This was a grand picture. He looked like a true lord of the forest; but I pitied the poor brute, as he was badly hurt; and, although his spirit was game to the last, his strength was paralyzed by a broken back.

It was a glorious opportunity for the horse. At the first unexpected roar the camel had bolted with its rider. The horse had, for a moment, started on one side, and the men had scattered; but in an instant I had reined Tirol up, and I gave rode straight toward the lion, who received the encounter about twenty paces distant.

Tigre was opposite the noble beast at bay, and, seeing no advance of the party, increased his rage, and growled deeply, fixing his glance upon the horse. I have patted Tirol on the neck, and spoke to him cosingly. He gassed intently at the lion, erected his mane, and snorted, but lowered no signs of retreat. "Bravo! old boy!" I said; and, encouraging him by caressing his neck with my hand, I rode slowly forward quite up with my heel. I let him just feel my hand upon the rein; and, with a "Come along, old lad!" I rode slowly and resolutely straight by step by step, toward the infuriated lion, that greeted him with continued growls. The horse would fume snorted loudly, and stared fixedly at the terrible face before him; but, as I constantly patted and caressed him, he did not refuse to advance. I checked him when within about six yards from the lion. This would have made a magnificent picture, as the horse, with astounding courage, faced the lion at bay. Both animals kept their eyes fixed upon each other, the one bounding with rage, the other with cool determination. This was enough; I dropped the reins upon his neck; it was a signal that Tirol perfectly understood, and he stood firm as a rock, for he knew that I was steadied him. I took aim at the head of the glorious but distressed lion, and a bullet from the little Fletcher dropped him dead. I did not, however, finished him shot. I now dismounted; and having patted and caressed the horse, I led him up to the lion, that was now in the agonies of death, and then gave my hand to the horse to smell. He snorted once or twice, and, as I released my hold of the animal, left him unmoved. Then, he slowly lowered his head and smelled the mane of the lion. He then turned a few steps upon one side, and commenced eating the withered grass beneath the nubbak bushes. My Arabs were perfectly delighted with this extraordinary instance of courage exhibited by the horse. I had now time to look at the lion. Haaji Ali and Tirol had advanced boldly toward the angry jaws of a lion that appeared about to spring. The camel had now brought in one eye and blindfolded, while we endeavored to secure the lion upon its back. As the camel was to be the bearer of the united exertions of eight men, including myself, to raise the ponderous animal, and to secure it across the saddle.

Although so active and cat-like in its movements, a full-grown lion weighs about five hundred and fifty pounds. Having secured it, we shortly arrived in camp. The camp d'oeil was beautiful, as the camel entered the interval, with the shaggy head and massive paws of the dead lion hanging upon one flank, while the tail trailed backward to the ground upon the opposite side. It was laid at full length before my tent. The Arabs, the claws were collected as a trophy, to be worn around the neck as a talisman. Not only are the claws prized by the Arabs, but the muzzle of the lion is carefully preserved and sewn in a leather envelope, to be worn as an amulet. Such a charm is supposed to protect the wearer from the attacks of wild animals.

In all probability, this was the lion that was in the habit of visiting our camp; as, from that time forward, the roars of such animals were our nightly music, we were never afterward visited so closely.

TO BE CONTINUED.

IN THE TENTED FIELD.

By JUSTIN M'CARTHY.

LYDIA WESTERN was only just recovering from the shock of her husband's sudden death when the full Indian fiasco showed that a serious war was on hand for the people of the United States. Lydia Western was fully twenty years younger than her husband; and she had never lived him with any thing like passionate ardor. But his affection and kindness and devotion had won her esteem and gratitude, and, at last, her tender regard. A wealthy New York merchant, he had taken her, a poor girl, an obscure teacher in a drawing, and raised her, by marrying her, into opulence and station. She was beautiful, she was highly cultivated, she presided with grace and brilliancy over Mr. Western's home and his social circle, and she was calmly happy and contented while he lived. He died after a day's illness, and she felt the shock profoundly; but, perhaps, all the more because she had not loved him. For she thought she ought to have loved him, and had, therefore, some remorse added to her grief. Life looked so blank and dreary to her, when she was thus left alone, that she felt she must lose herself in some earnest and active work, or sink into a monotonous far worse than death. She had no children.

So, when the war deepened and grew more sanguinary, she made up her mind that she would be a nurse, that she would organize a staff of nurses, and try to do such work as Florence Nightingale and Miss Stanley had done in the Crimea, as many noble American women were doing even then on American battle-fields. She obtained permission from the Government to do her best; and she was attached to the Army of the Potomac, and she found ample and good service to the wounded of more than one bloody field. I am not going to tell of her services here, to enter into any detail of how and of she did. Many other American ladies did the same work; and the country knows what they have done, and how much they deserved who thus spontaneously and nobly devoted themselves to do it. Besides, this is a story of love in the serious business of war and wounds and nursing only comes in here as a back-ground or frame-work for my tale.

A great battle was being fought in Virginia, and the wounded were being brought in faster than the best exertions of surgeons or nurses could attend to; and Lydia Western was occupied as best as any man or woman could be in Federal lines. Into the tent where she was engaged they were bringing new sufferers every moment; and one wounded, insensible man was laid at last across the entrance to the tent, so that no one could pass in or out without stepping over his body. Lydia came, in due time, to this poor creature, who was lying there unnoticed and unheeded, and she found that he had a severe wound in the shoulder from a fragment of shell, apparently, and a heavy sabre-cut on the head. He was insensible, indeed, but still breathing strongly and regularly; and Mrs. Western thought there was good hope for him. For the moment, however, there was nothing to be done for him but to let him lie there undisturbed, as she attended to others, but came softly over every now and then to see whether he was in a condition to receive food or medicine.

I have said that Lydia had been a teacher of drawing. She had indeed a special passion for it with her pencil, and might with perseverance have become a successful artist if fortune had not favored her from her the straining necessities of having to earn her bread. This poor fellow lying wounded at the entrance of the tent had a face and form which appealed with irresistible power to her artistic faculties. In the first there are descriptions of wounded and dying heroes lying on the battle-field which might almost make one in love with wounds and death, so exquisite are the pictures of their suffering. They lie there, the beautiful youths of Greece or Troy, stern and graceful in their self-possession, the blood encircling by purple contrast the golden glory of their curling locks and the calm marble whiteness of their foreheads and shoulders. The solemn beauty of a statue, the thrill and color of life, the sublime pathos that only death can give, are all there at once; and I question whether any generous boy ever read some of these Homeric descriptions without envying the fate that meant "the stately repose and the lordly delight of the city whose strength is in arms," and not made fascinating and noble. Well, the youth who lay insensible at Lydia Western's feet was one whose wounded form and whose wounded head Homer might have loved to picture. A form all grace and suppleness and strength and symmetry, the chest of Antinous, the head of Apollo, the golden, curling, waving hair of Achilles. The blood that soaked into that golden hair and ran seemed to bring with it any suggestion of horror or hideousness, so calm was the expression of the face, so rich and beautiful the blending of purple and gold in the war-stained curls. In truth, the nurse was for the moment lost to the artist. Lydia gazed not so much with pity at the sufferer as with admiration at the model. She could hardly withdraw her eyes from the noble, graceful form, every outline of which, despite the wounds and the weakness, seemed made to speak of the very pride and glory of youthful, manly health. In fact, a temptation came upon Lydia Western which she could not resist. She had always a pencil in her belt; she found a large piece of white paper. She knelt by the wounded man in the sinking sunlight of an exquisite autumnal evening; and there, with the wounded, and the dead all around her, with the battle still raging only, as it seemed, a few furlongs off, with the roar of the cannon shaking in the leaves of the trees, and the very blades of the grass near the tent, she occupied herself in making a rapid drawing of that noble face and figure. While she drew, the artist began to yield to the woman, and she looked with inexpressible admiration and pity on the face of the wounded youth; and giving way to a sudden irresistible emotion, for which she presently felt her cheek grow crimson and her with shame, she bent down and dropped a kiss, which felt light as a falling rose-leaf on the soldier's silent lips. She started up, almost affrighted, for she fancied that the soldier's eyes opened for a moment, and a slight sigh seemed to escape from the lips she had kissed. But that must have been only the delusion of her remorseful conscientia. For when, hundred young man, just recovering from the effects of his wounds, and therefore very dull and sluggish in the memory of a little woman's face, which, in good truth, was that of Lydia Western.

Lydia Western went to Europe and brought her picture with her. It was small, and she would not sell it without it; although she had given up showing it to any body, and now kept it only for her own eyes, and her own dulled and regrets. In Florence she was a frequent visitor to the salon of a French lady whom she had known in Paris, and who was fond of the society of Americans. This lady was a genuine bonhomme, and very frank in her worldly disinterment of her predilections, and she liked charming women, such as Lydia Western, especially when they possessed also a fortune; because, since the days of Æneas, so we all know, lions have been drawn by the attractions of pretty women.

"I am an egotist, unquestionably, my dear," this lady said to her one night, drawing her into a corner of the crowded salon, "I am quite decided, indeed. I expected to have presented to you such a beau garçon, one of my compatriots, and almost a connection by the relation of yours."

"Indeed, Madame! Who is he?" Lydia asked, not greatly interested in the answer.

"But the young Vicomte Charles d'Esterre! Do you not know he actually quarreled with his family, a devoted Bonapartist and Imperialist, and exiled himself from his home, to fight under the Stars and Stripes for love for liquidity? Like the brave young Orleans princes—whom he knows as of his intimate friends."

"I am afraid I have not met the Vicomte Charles d'Esterre in our army. Not of course he may have been there and I not know it. I am surprised that I never heard his name."

"Ah! but that is the romance of the story. He served as a private soldier under some very ordinary name. His parents knew nothing of him until he came back wounded and sent in his title the war was over. He had been taken by the enemy and immured in the dreadful prisons of the South. Such adventures! He shall tell them to you himself."

"But if he is not coming—?"

"He shall come. He shall know that there is a lovely American who, like him, followed the arts of the Muses, and who knows every bottle and he will come delighted. For the rest, he loves America; and he has himself told me that the most beautiful face he ever saw he saw in America. But, unhappily, it was only in a dream."

"I, too," thought Lydia to herself, "it seem to have seen the face which most deeply interested me in a dream. But it is best it might not. I have been a dream as the futile, fading reality that it was."

She said nothing, however, and the conversation dropped, and the Vicomte Charles d'Esterre did not come that night, and Lydia nearly forgot all about him.

A few days passed and she received a note from him.

"MADAME,—Why have I not seen you since there fancy days? Because tonight. he says you are not, for we young here of the American war is coming; and I have received him of you, and he longs to be presented to you."

Why did Lydia feel something like a trepidation, to her quite unusual, as she received the friend's soiree that night? I fancy people do have such an anticipation more often than we suppose when something momentous is about to happen to them. If we will only remember, I think we shall find that we always had a vague sub-knowledge of the fact when about to meet some one who was destined profoundly to affect the course of our lives. Lydia did feel strangely possessed and exalté as she entered the room that night.

But she soon summoned to her energy.

"Madame Lydia Western, I have the honor to present to you my compatriot, much distinguished, and your fellow-soldier, the Vicomte Charles d'Esterre."

And then, bowing before Lydia, stood the hero of her picture, the wounded soldier of her battle-field, the whole noble face the same, the whole silent lips she had kissed. And as he, bowing, raised his eyes they kept on the face of the Madonna-like woman—the face which had been over his as he lay on the Virginia battle-field.

"But you have met before!" exclaimed the hostess, seeing the simultaneous flash of recognition and silence in the eyes of both her friends.

"I have seen M. the Vicomte before," Lydia said, in a low, hesitating, almost a trembling voice; "but I did not then know him."

"And I," said D'Esterre—"I have seen Madame, but I did not know it was in a dream."

They spoke a little of the war and its events; but Lydia said nothing of the tent and the tresses. She had found her hero, but as yet she did not dare to acknowledge him. He, in his part, was almost wholly bewildered. The mystery was all inexplicable to him; and when he approached her, as she retreated, as evidently with a purpose that he forbore to press the subject. But he obtained permission to visit her the next day.

Lydia prepared to receive him, and deliberately did something for which every prudent, proper, self-respecting, dignified, and well-regulated woman would, I am sure, utterly condemn her. She placed in her room the picture to which she had devoted so much love and labor.

"My picture—my very picture!" exclaimed D'Esterre, as his eyes fell upon the painting. "Then, Madame, it was not a dream? It was your face which bent over me as I lay on that field—it was your eyes which looked so pityingly into mine—it was—And I have dreamed of you ever since!"

"He does not know of the kiss, thank Heaven!" Lydia said, in her own mind; but she blushed, nevertheless, and indeed she was wrong in her assumption.

"It was I, Vicomte," she said, "who saw you there, and who left you on the battle-field to die, or to be made prisoner."

"It was you who saved my life!" he exclaimed, with extraordinary vivacity. "You are my guardy and pity recalled me to existence, and made his whole having, and gave me an ideal and a hope that never left me."

They were self-confessed lovers already. This was somewhat heart-making indeed; but then it seems somehow to have been decreed and arranged beforehand, and, in short, they had been loving each other for years. They were married the other day; and the principal ornament of their salon is the picture of the young soldier lying wounded on the battle-field.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A LADY had been cautioning her son, a bright, affectionate little boy, in the matter of telling evil. "You know, my child," she said, "I can not help believing whatever you tell me, for I know you will not lie. Ah! Freddy, you have filled my heart with joy." "Then, mamma," replied the dear little child, "you must be extremely glad that I may know something of the feelings of a father!"

"Sambo, did you ever see the Catskill Mountains?" "No, Sah; but I've seen 'em all skilled."

The art of puffing has reached its climax out in Illinois. This is the way they do it: "If you want to read the news of the day of the bloody river, the rush of the mighty Colorado over falls the imagination fails to picture, descriptions which have rent the hearts of the mountains, and down into the inner depths of the earth, go there to Major Powell."

Why is the earth like a blackboard?—Because the children of men multiply upon the face of it.

A man whose wife hung herself in his presence, on seeing nobody was near, did not prevent her, replied: "I cut her down three times last week, and I saw it was no use cutting her down."

In studying the book of Nature the best reading will be found in the swamps.

If you want your neighbors to "know all about you," give a party, and don't invite the folks who live next door.

Asking a lady what her accomplishments are is generally equivalent to a summer sunset. Still, in these days, it might in some cases cause embarrassment to ask the question. "Do you paint?"

A TEXAS murderer wants his execution delayed because he is in poor health.

A young gentleman recently found himself in company with three young ladies, and generously divided an orange between them. "Now, girls," he said, "you've got a piece apiece for the damsels. "Not at all," replied the eldest; "one of the damsels is a widow, and the other is an orphan."

Will Street is seldom original, but is great in quotations.

A young man, accompanied by his lady-love, took breakfast at an hotel the other day. Never having seen any fat-balls, he handed one to his lady, under the impression that it was a dough-nut. After breaking open the delicacy, and examining the contents of it and with a sagacious voice said, "Sal, don't eat that dough-nut. Ther's nothin' in it but lard."

Old Master Brown brought his firule down,
His face was angry and red;
Master Blazer, fly at the door,
Among the girls," he said.

So Anthony Blazer, with a mottled air,
And his head hung down on his breast,
Walked away and sat all day
By the girl who loved him best.

How would you paint an absent-minded friend?—In brown study.

"You say," said a judge to a witness, "that the plaintiff resorted to an ingenious device to ascertain the character of the defendant. What you mean by that?" "Well," said the witness, "my exact meaning is, that he lied."

DIFFICULT PENETRATION.—Putting a stop to a geologist's tongue.

A close-fisted fellow treating a friend to some old wine poured out a very small quantity. The latter, tasting the liquor, and holding it before his eyes, remarked, rather skeptically: "You say this is forty years old?" "Yes, sir," answered the host. "Then," rejoined our friend, "all I have to say is, that it is very small for its age."

Why are farmers like fowls?—Because neither will get crops without industry.

A man, on being told how generous farmer that he would give forty cents of Cider, said he would like to bring it to his house. "Certainly, replied the farmer, with pleasure." "Well," said the other, disappointed, "what will you pay me for the barrel when the cider is gone?"

TO AVOID DRAUGHTS.—Don't take any.

"Really, my dear," said poor Mr. Jones to his "better half," "you have made a grievous error. I have ordered you a jewel of a woman; but you've turned out only a bit of mechanical genius." "There, my love," was the reply, "console yourself with the idea that yours is very salvable, and will stick to you as long as you live."

A physician examining a student as to his progress, said to him, "Should a man fall into a forty feet well deep, and strike his head against one of the tools with which he had been digging, what is the first step you'd take if called in as a surgeon?" The student replied, "I would advise them to leave him there, sir, and fill up the well."

PEASANT FUNERAL IN THE MAM TURK MOUNTAINS OF CONNEMARA, IRELAND.—[See Page 394.]

THE MEETING.

WITH Time I turn—years backward flow,
Again that golden shore I trace,
Where, in the light of long ago,
I first beheld thy face.

Soft summer airs waved warm and light;
A solemn psalm, breathed o'er the bay,
Came like the chord's mated march of Night,
Ascending far away.

The sun burned downward to the deep,
And glowed through many a parable bar;
While, like a virgin from her sleep,
Arose the Evening Star.

There oft had I, with care oppressed,
Forgetful, dream'd of other lands;
And then sought a realm of rest
Along those silent sands.

As mists that melt in azure skies,
Thy tears fell fast; such woe was mine;
Like magnets glanced thy streaming eyes,
And drew my soul to thine.

A PEASANT FUNERAL IN IRELAND.

ON page 393 we give, this week, an illustration of a peasant funeral in the Mom Turk Mountains of Connemara, Ireland. It consisted, when an eye-witness of the mourning incident, mostly of women and girls. The chief mourner sat in the cart beside the coffin, which was simply a rough deal box, wrapped about with a white sheet, to signify that the corpse was that of a virgin, the plain wood being left uncovered at both ends. They had a journey of eight Irish miles before them to the place of interment. The inset at the foot of this mournful sketch is like that of the Western Highlanders of Scotland, in their rough grey tweed and blue bonnets. The women cover their heads and shoulders with a square piece of white flannel, which is used, like the Scottish plaid, for other purposes—as a coverlet when sleeping, or to carry a burden or a child in.

FOURTEENTH SCENE.—PORTLAND PLACE.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-SIXTH.

A SCOTCH MARRIAGE.

SIR PATRICK LUNDIE and ANNE SILVESTER were alone in the room.

He took from the breast-pocket of his coat the sheet of note-paper which contained Anne's letter, and Geoffrey's reply. His hand trembled as he held it; his voice faltered as he spoke.

"I have done all that can be done," he said. "If I have left nothing untried, to prevent the necessity of producing this."

"I feel your kindness gratefully, Sir Patrick. You must produce it now."

The woman's calmness presented a strange and touching contrast to the man's emotion. There was no shrinking in her face, there was no unsteadiness in her voice as she answered him.

He took her hand. Twice he attempted to speak; and twice his own agitation overpowered him. He offered the letter to her in silence.

In silence, on her side, she put the letter away from her, wondering what he meant.

"Take it back," he said. "I can't produce it! I daren't produce it! After what my own eyes have seen, after what my own ears have heard, in the next room—as God is my witness, I daren't ask you to declare yourself Geoffrey Delamayn's wife!"

She answered him in one word.

"Should!"

He shook his head impatiently. "Not even in Blanche's interests! Not even for Blanche's sake! If there is any risk, it is a risk I am ready to run. I hold to my own opinion. I believe my own vow to be right. Let it come on as an appeal to the law! I will fight the case, and win it!"

"Are you sure of winning it, Sir Patrick?"

Instead of replying, he pressed the letter on her. "Destroy it," he whispered. "And rely on my silence."

She took the letter from him.

"Destroy it," he repeated. "They may open the doors. They may come in at any moment, and see it in your hand."

"I have something to ask you, Sir Patrick, before I destroy it. Blanche refuses to write, or to her husband, unless she returns with the certain assurance of being really his wife. If I produce this letter, she may go back to him to-day. If I declare myself Geoffrey Delamayn's wife, I clear Arnold Brinkworth, at once and forever, of all suspicion of being married to me. Can you as certainly and effectually clear him in any other way? Answer me that, as a man of honor speaking to a woman who implicitly trusts him!"

She looked him full in the face. His eyes dropped before hers—he made no reply.

"I am answered," she said.

With those words, she passed him, and laid her hand on the door.

He checked her. The tears rose in his eyes as he drew her gently back into the room.

"Why should we wait?" she asked.

"Wait," he answered, "as a favor to me."

She seated herself calmly in the nearest chair, and rested her head on her hand, thinking.

He bent over her, and roused her, impatiently, almost angrily. The steady resolution in her face was terrible to him, when he thought of the man in the next room.

"Take nothing to consider," he pleaded. "Don't be led away by your own impulse. Don't act under a false excitement. Nothing can spur to this dreadful sacrifice of yourself."

"Excitement!" she said. She smiled sadly as she repeated the words. "Do you know, Sir Patrick, what I was thinking of a moment since? Only of old times, when I was a little girl. I saw the sad side of life sooner than most children see it. My mother was always delicate. The hard marriage laws of this country were harder on her than on me. She died brokenhearted. But one friend comforted her at the last moment, and promised to be a mother to her child. I can't remember one instance of it in all the years when I lived with that faithful woman and her little daughter—till the day that parted me. She went away with her husband; and I and the little daughter were left behind. She said her last words to me. Her voice comes back to me after the dread of coming death. 'I promised your mother that you should be like my own child to me; and it quieted her mind. Quiet my mind, Anne, before I go. Whatever happens in years to come—promise me to be always what you are now.' I went to Miss Blanche. Where is the false excitement, Sir Patrick, in all the circumstances that I now see? And how can there be a sacrifice in any thing that I do for Blanche?"

She rose, and offered him her hand. Sir Patrick lifted it to his lips in silence.

"Come!" she said. "For both our sakes, let us not prolong this."

He turned aside his head. It was no moment to let her see that she had touched and mastered him. She waited for him, with her hand on the lock. He rallied his courage to the last effort—to face the horror of the situation calmly. She opened the door, and led the way back into the other room.

Not a word was spoken by any of the persons present, as the two returned to their places. The noise of a carriage passing in the street was painfully audible. The hour's hush of the door in the lower regions of the house made every one start.

Anne's sweet voice broke the dreary silence.

"Must I speak for myself, Sir Patrick? Or will you (I ask it as a last and greatest favor) speak for me?"

"You insist on appealing to the letter in your hand?"

"I am resolved to appeal to it."

"Will nothing induce you to defer the close of this inquiry—so far as you are concerned—for four-and-twenty hours?"

"Either or I, Sir Patrick, must say what is to be said, and do what is to be done, before we leave this room."

"Give me the letter."

She gave it to him. Mr. Moy whispered to his client. "Do you know your wife's hand?" Geoffrey shook his head. "Do you really remember nothing about it?" Geoffrey answered in one word more. "Nothing!"

Sir Patrick addressed himself to the assembled company.

"I have to ask your pardon," he said, "for abruptly leaving the room, and for obliging Miss Silvester to leave it with me. Every body present, except that man" (he pointed to Geoffrey), "will at least understand my motive in doing so, that I am forced to make my conduct the subject of the plainest and the fullest explanation. I shall address that explanation, for reasons which will presently appear, to my niece."

Blanche turned. "To me!" she exclaimed.

"To you," Sir Patrick answered.

Blanche turned toward Arnold, daunted by a vague sense of something serious to come. The letter that she had received from her husband on her departure from Hurn Rise had been carefully alluded to relations between Geoffrey and Anne, of which Blanche had been previously ignorant. "Is my reference correct to those relations? Was there something yet to be disclosed, which Arnold's letter had not prepared her to hear?"

Sir Patrick resumed.

"A short time since," he said to Blanche, "I proposed to you to return to your husband's protection—and to leave the responsibility in this matter in my hands. You have refused to go back to him until you are first certainly assured that you are his wife. I have taken a position for your interests and your happiness, on Miss Silvester's part—which I tell you frankly I have done my utmost to prevent—I am in a position to prove positively that Arnold Brinkworth was a single man when he married you from the farmhouse in Kent."

Mr. Moy's experience forewarned him of what was coming. He pointed to the letter in Sir Patrick's hand.

"Is that letin on a promise of marriage?" he asked.

Sir Patrick rejoined by putting a question on his side.

"Do you remember the famous decision at Doctors' Commons, which established the marriage of Captain Dalrymple and Miss Gordon?" Mr. Moy was answered. "I understand you, Sir Patrick," he said. After a moment's pause, he addressed his next words to Anne. "And, from the bottom of my heart, madam, I respect you."

It was said with a fervent sincerity of tone which wrought the interest of the other persons, who were still waiting for enlightenment, to the highest pitch. Lady Lundie and Captain Newenden whispered to each other anxiously. Arnold turned pale. Blanche burst into tears.

Sir Patrick turned once more to his niece.

"Some little time since," he said, "I had occasion to speak to you of the scandalous uncertainty of the marriage laws of Scotland. But for that uncertainty (entirely without parallel in any other civilized country in Europe), Arnold Brinkworth would never have occupied the position to which he stands here to-day—and these proceedings would never have taken place. Bear that fact in mind. It is not only answerable for the mischief that has been already done, but for the far more serious evil which is still to come.

Mr. Moy took a note. Sir Patrick went on.

"Long ago, there is now no longer any. there happens, however, to be one case in which the action of it has been confirmed and settled by the Scotch Courts. A written promise of marriage exchanged between a man and woman, in Scotland, constitutes that man and woman by Scotch law. An English Court of Justice (sitting in judgment on the case I have just mentioned) Mr. Moy) has pronounced that law to be good—and the decision has since been confirmed by the supreme authority of the House of Lords. Where the persons therefore—living in Scotland at the time—have promised each other that they are married, there is now no longer any doubt. They are certainly, and lawfully, Man and Wife." He turned from his niece, and appealed to Mr. Moy. "Am I right?"

"Quite right, Sir Patrick, as to the facts. I own, however, to my first sense of surprise on them surprises me. I have the highest opinion of our Scottish marriage law. A man who has betrayed a woman under a promise of marriage is forced by that law (in the interests of public morality) to acknowledge her as his wife."

"The person is here present, Mr. Moy, are now about to see the moral merit of the Scotch law of marriages (so reviled by England) practically in operation before their own eyes. They will judge for themselves of the morality (Scotch and English) which first forces a deserted woman back on the villain who has betrayed her, and then unwillingly leaves her to bear the consequences."

With that answer, he turned to Anne, and showed her the letter, open in his hand.

"For the last time," he said, "do you insist on my appealing to this?"

She rose, and bowed her head gravely.

"It is my misfortune, Sir Patrick," she said, "to declare, in this lady's name, and on the faith of written promises of marriage exchanged between the parties, then residing in Scotland, that she claims to be now—and to have been on the afternoon of the fourteenth of August last—Mrs. Geoffrey Delamaya's wedded wife."

A cry of horror from Blanche, a low murmur of dismay from other rest, followed the utterance of those words.

There was a pause of an instant.

Then Geoffrey rose slowly to his feet, and fixed his eyes on the wife who had claimed him. The spectacle of the terrible scene turned with one accord toward the sacrificed woman. The look which Geoffrey had cast on her—the words which Geoffrey had spoken to her—were present to all their minds. She stood, waiting for Sir Patrick's decision, on his fresh resting sadly and tenderly on Blanche's face. To see that matchless courage and resignation was to doubt the reality of what had happened. They were forced to look back at the man to possess their minds with the truth.

The triumph of law and morality over him was complete. He never uttered a word. His famous temper, perfectly and fearfully calm. With the promise of merciless vengeance written in the look that was fixed on his Devil-possessed face, he kept his eyes fixed on the hated woman when he had ruined—on the hated woman who was fastened to him for life by his wife.

His lawyer went over to the table at which Sir Patrick sat. Sir Patrick handed him the sheet of note-paper.

He read the two letters contained in it with absorbed and deliberate attention. The moments that passed before he lifted his head from his reading seemed like hours. "Can you prove the handwriting?" he asked. "And prove the residence?"

Sir Patrick took up a second morsel of paper lying ready under his hand.

"There are the names of persons who can prove the handwriting," he said, "and prove the residence," he replied. "One of your two witnesses below stairs (Geoffrey's servant) can speak to the hour at which Mr. Brinkworth arrived at the inn, and so can prove that the lady for whom he asked was, at that moment, Miss Geoffrey Delamayn. The indorsement on the back of the note-paper, also referring to the question of time, is in the handwriting of the same witness—to whom I refer you, when it suits your convenience to question him."

"I will verify the references, Sir Patrick, as a matter of course." In the mean time, such a needless and vexatious delay, I am bound to say that I can not resist the evidence of the marriage."

Having replied in those terms, he addressed himself, with marked respect and sympathy, to Anne.

"On the faith of the written promise of marriage exchanged between you in Scotland," he said, "you claim Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn as your husband?"

She steadily repeated the words after him.

"I claim Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn as my husband."

Mr. Moy appealed to his client. Geoffrey broke silence at last.

"Is it settled?" he asked.

"To all practical purposes, it is settled."

He went on, still looking at nobody but Anne. "Was the law of Scotland made her my wife?"

"The law of Scotland has made her your wife."

He asked a third and last question.

"Does the law tell her to go where her husband goes?"

"Yes."

He laughed softly to himself, and beckoned to her to cross the room to the place in which he was standing.

She obeyed. At the moment when she took the first step to approach him, Sir Patrick caught her hand, and whispered to her, "Rely on me!" She gently released his hand as he spoke that she understood him, and advanced to Geoffrey. At the same moment, Blanche rushed between them, and flung her arms around Anne's neck.

"Oh, Anne! Anne!"

An hysterical paroxysm of tears choked her utterance. Anne gently unwound the arms that clung round her—gently lifted the head that lay on her bosom—kissed her.

"Happier days are coming, my love," she said. "Don't think of me."

She kissed her—looked at her—kissed her again—and placed her in her husband's arms. Arnold remembered her parting words at Craig Ferrie, when they had wished each other goodnight. "You have not befriended an ungrateful woman. The day may yet come when I shall prove it." Gratitude and admiration struggled in his breast which almost stifled him. He held him speechless.

She bent her head gently in token that she understood him. Then she went on, and stood before Geoffrey.

"I am here," she said to him. "What do you wish me to do?"

A hideous smile parted his heavy lips. He answered her.

"Mrs. Geoffrey Delamayn," he said. "Come home."

The picture of the lonely house, isolated amidst its high walls; the ill-omened figure of the dumb woman with the ivory eyes and the savage ways—the whole scene, as Anne had pictured it to him but two days since, rose vividly in reality before Sir Patrick's mind. "No!" he cried out, carried away by the generous impulse of the moment. "I shall not be!"

Geoffrey stood impenetrable—waiting with his folded arms. For the second time, he lifted her noble head—called back the courage which had faltered for a moment—and took his arm.

He led her to the door. "Don't let Blanche fret about me," she said, simply, to Arnold as they went by. They passed him in the next. Once more the sympathy for her set every other consideration at defiance. He started up to bar the way to Geoffrey. Geoffrey paused, and looked at Sir Patrick for the first time.

"The law tells her to go with her husband," he said. "The law forbids you to part Man and Wife."

True. Absolutely, undeniably true. The law sanctioned the sacrifice of her as unanswerably as it had sanctioned the sacrifice of her mother before her. Under the name of Geoffrey, let him take her! In the interests of Virtue, let her get out of it if she could!

Her husband opened the door. Mr. Moy laid his hand on Sir Patrick's arm. Lady Lundie, Captain Newenden, the London lawyer, all left clear places; influenced, for once, by the same interest—feeling, for once, the same suggestion. Arnold followed them, supporting his wife. For one memorable instant Anne looked back at them all. Then she and her husband crossed the threshold. They descended the stairs together. The opening and closing of the house door was heard. They were gone.

Done, in the name of Morality. Done, in the interests of Virtue. Done, in an age of progress, and under the most perfect government on the face of the earth.

FIFTEENTH SCENE.—HOLCHESTER HOUSE.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-SEVENTH.

THE LAST CHANCE.

"His lordship is dangerously ill, Sir. Her ladyship can receive no visitors."

"Be so good as to take that card to Lady Holchester. It is absolutely necessary that your mistress should be made acquainted—in the interests of her own younger son—with somethings that I can only mention to her ladyship herself."

The two persons speaking were Lord Holchester's head servant and Sir Patrick Lundie. At that time barely half an hour had passed since the departure of the newly-married Portland Place.

The servant still hesitated with the card in his hand. "I shall forfeit my situation, Sir," he said, "if I do it."

"You will most assuredly forfeit your situation if you don't do it," returned Sir Patrick. "I warn you plainly, this is too serious a matter to be trifled with."

The tone in which those words were spoken had its effect. The man went up stairs with his message.

Sir Patrick waited in the hall. Even the momentary delay of entering one of the reception-rooms was more than he could endure at that moment. Anne's happiness was hopelessly sacrificed already. The preservation of her personal safety—which Sir Patrick firmly believed to be in danger—was the one service which it was possible to render to her now. The perilous position in which she stood toward her husband's wife presented formidable obstacles, while she lived, between Geoffrey and Mrs. Glenarm—was beyond the reach of remedy. But it was still possible to prevent her from becoming the innocent cause of Geoffrey's pecuniary ruin, by standing in the way of a reconciliation between father and son. Resolute to leave no means untried of serving Anne's interests, Sir Patrick had allowed Arnold and Blanche to go to his own residence in London, alone, and had not even waited to say a farewell word to any of the persons who had taken part in the inquiry. "Her life may depend on what I can do for her at Holchester House!" he had first convinced himself, as he had left Portland Place. With that conviction in him, he had sent his message to Lady Holchester, and was now waiting for the reply.

The servant appeared again on the stairs. Sir Patrick went up to meet him.

"Her Ladyship will see you, Sir, for a few minutes."

The door of an upper room was opened; and Sir Patrick found himself in the presence of Geoffrey's mother. There was only time to observe that she possessed the remains of more personal beauty, and that she received her visitor with a grave and courtesy which implied (under the circumstances) a considerate regard for his position at the expense of her own.

"You have something to say to me, Sir Patrick, on the subject of my second son. I am in great affliction. If you have any help to give, will do my best to hear it. May I trust to your kindness not to keep me in suspense?"

"I will help me to make my intrusion as little painful as possible to your ladyship," replied Sir Patrick, "if I am permitted to ask a question. Have you heard of any obstacle to the contemplated marriage of Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn and Miss Silvester?"

Even that distant reference to Anne produced an emotion to change for the worse in Lady Holchester's manner.

"I have heard of the obstacle to which you allude," she said. "Mrs. Glenarm informed me of it this morning."

"Is your ladyship aware of the nature of the obstacle?"

"I am not one of the witnesses of the marriage."

"Good Heavens! And Lord Holchester's lawyer has left the house!"

"Can I replace him? Have I, by any chance, justified you in telling me what happened this morning in the room?"

"Justified me? You have left me no other alternative. The doctors are all agreed in dreading apoplexy—and you force me to open a document. In the lawyer's absence, I must take it on myself. There can be no harm in the codicil to Lord Holchester's Will which is still unsigned."

"Relating to his second son?"

"Relating to Geoffrey Delamayn, and giving him (what is in fact executed) a liberal provision for life."

"What is the object in the way of his executing it?"

"The lady whom you have just mentioned to me."

"Anne Silvester!"

"Anne Silvester—now (as you tell me) Mrs. Geoffrey Delamayn. I can not believe that anything very imperfectly. There are certain pitiful circumstances associated in his lordship's memory with this lady, which unfortunately for his duty, but which apparently led to very sad results, (though not since he unfortunately left either through Mrs. Glenarm or through Mrs. Arnold Dalrymple) to Mrs. Silvester's appearance at Swanhaven Lodge. No remarks on the subject escaped him at the time. It was only this morning, when the physical prostration to Geoffrey was waiting to be executed, that his real feeling in the matter came out. To our astonishment, he refused to sign it. 'Find another Solicitor' (was the only answer we could get from him); 'and let him draw it up.' I can not tell my son is guiltless of injuring her. I am lying on my death-bed. I have serious reasons of my own

"I owe it to the memory of the dead to acquit myself of the truth. If Anne Silvester herself should appear, I am prepared to do justice, to provide for Geoffrey. Not otherwise.' We went the length of reminding him that he might die before Geoffrey could be found. Our interference had but one result. He desired the codicil to be brought to him, and he put the date which he executed on the spot. It directs his executors to inquire into the relations that have actually existed between the late Mrs. Silvester and her younger son. If we find reason to conclude that Geoffrey has been privately married, we are directed to pay her a legacy—provided that she is a single woman at the time."

"And if the marriage violates the provision?" exclaimed Sir Patrick.

"Yes. Such a codicil actually executed is now worthless. And the other codicil remains now signed until the lawyer can produce Miss Silvester. He has left the house to go to Geoffrey at Fulham, as the only means at our disposal of finding her. Two hours have passed—and he has not yet returned.

"It is useless to wait for him," said Sir Patrick. "While the lawyer is on his way to Fulham, Lord Holchester's son was on his way to Portland Place. This is even more serious than you suppose. I have no time to explain the pressing circumstances I should have no right to ask. Apart from the considerations which affect it, is Geoffrey Delamayn's position in the will?"

"He is not even mentioned in it."

Her visitor rose to his feet.

Mr. Marchwood unlocked a drawer, and took out.

Sir Patrick instantly rose from his chair. "No waiting for the lawyer!" he repeated, vehemently. "This is a matter of life and death. Lady Holchester bitterly resents her son's marriage. She will destroy the will as it stands, if Mr. Glenarm. Do you think Lord Holchester would take the same view, if he knew of it?"

"It depends entirely on the circumstances."

"I suppose I informed him—as I inform you in confidence—that his son has gravely wronged Miss Silvester? And suppose I followed that up by telling him that his son has made atonement by marrying her?"

"After the feeling that he has shown in the matter, I believe he would sign the codicil."

"Then, for God's sake, let me see him!"

"I must speak to the doctor."

"Do it instantly!"

With the will in his hand, Mr. Marchwood advanced to the bedroom door. In a few quiet words from within he could get to it. The door was immediately opened to the threshold. He held up his hand warningly when Mr. Marchwood attempted to speak to him.

"Go to Lady Holchester," he said. "It's all over."

"Dead!"

"Dead."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE question of a revision of the English Bible has been again raised by Canon Brinkin. The Convocation of York declined to join in the work with the Convocation of Canterbury. The latter, however, has resolved to undertake it, and asks the aid of all religious denominations. The Dean of Canterbury desires to include the Jews, so far as the Old Testament is concerned; and every one who has an amendment to propose should send it to the Archbishop of Canterbury. It has been estimated that an adequate revision would change one word in every verse of the New Testament.

MARVELS of surgery increase. The following extraordinary story comes from San Juan, Argentine Republic, of a man who, there was an individual—sale or female deponent sayeth not—eighteen years old, and, for the purpose of two heads, each provided with an expressive countenance, looking in opposite directions, and united at the inferior part of the cranium. One of the scientific European celebrities, however, has, through the Argentine Republic, proposed to operate upon the patient, taking away one of the heads. The proposal was accepted, and the operation was successfully performed, without causing the least pain to the patient, notwithstanding that chloroform was not administered, and the operation lasted six minutes. The operation, and the subsequent cure of the parts, is represented as being something marvelous. The head has been preserved in spirits of wine, and shortly be exhibited in this country. Barnum's Museum was its existence in the world doubtless find an entrance there. Those who enjoy the wonderful will be able to gaze upon it, under this title, as it comes fresh from South American pastures. Some doubt is held their opinion in reserve until the head arrives.

SOME of the Paris Journals have been delighting in a "serious question" said to have taken place between the ex-King and Queen of Bavaria, on the Empress Eugenie's departing for Vienna. It now appears that there is no foundation for such a statement. The Queen, in great grief at the loss of her child, was induced to accompany her sister-in-law on her visit to Austria; and the King has since rejoined her Majesty, having been unable to complete sooner his arrangements for leaving Rome. From such simple facts a great scandal was created. Such is the fate of great people, and there of lesser importance do not always escape.

RUMOR has crowded this year with crowned heads and princes. The Emperor of Russia, Prince Oscar of Sweden, the Kings of Bavaria and Wirtemberg, the Grand Duke of Baden, and the King William of Prussia will all be there in the course of the season.

"I can not afford to die in New York," said a gentleman once; "it would ruin my family to bury me here." The same reason might be preached from his text on the folly of ultra-fashionable funerals, where show is the principal thing. There is something revolting in the very idea of display in connection with death. Secrecy—even from publicity—and were it not for the wishes of outside friends, many a gifted stricken family would choose to bury their dead with only the nearest and dearest as mourners. They would not choose to have hired hands decorate the casket or the hearse, or request floral work or a eulogy, but would themselves, with loving hands, scatter the sweet flowers, whose every blossom would then mean love.

The following story is told by the Court Journal of a soldier-dancer who figured in the Russian capital last winter, and who proved to be an intelligent woman and the daughter of a Polish count. She refused the addresses of the scions from her admirers, among whom was a very wealthy nobleman. He offered her a diamond as he was upon his diagnosis. She refused it, and he gladly gave her the jewel. His suit did not prosper, however, he is said. At the end of a month he presented her with another diamond, and with a second suitor. At the end of the year he had in this way parted with his whole fortune, and was rejected by her stubbornness he sought an interview and upbraided her. "I have no inducements to give you," he said. "Then," she replied, "I have no more kisses." "What am I to do?" he asked. "Go to the devil!" she said. "Give me some word of hope." "I can't do that, but I will give you some good counsel." "What is it?" "Never buy your first kiss of a woman; if you do, perhaps you will the Czar himself you would be bankrupt before you reached her heart."

A new cable is to be laid between France and England at a cost of about £100,000.

MR. Spurgeon lately announced—to say English papers—his intention of delivering a lecture in London only: none will be admitted to the Hall except he is worth £1,000. A novel idea, certainly. Will the plate be passed at the door of service?

A German translation of "Edwin Drood" is now being published in a Hamburg journal.

The Beethoven Festival will be the great sensation of next week. There is every prospect that the entertainment will be exceedingly fine. An organ has been built for the occasion, which contains two sets of keys, two and a half octaves of pedals, thirty-one stops, and fifteen mechanical pipes. The finest musical societies in the country, and the principal vocalists have been secured to aid in this grand celebration.

The ordinary process of making superfine white flour results in the loss of the most nutritious portion of the wheat. Under the microscope a grain of wheat divides into three principal layers—the hull, or bran, proper, which is the cuticle; the gluten, which lies next within the hull, and which is the most nutritious part of the grain; and the starch, from which the ordinary wheat flour is made. Usually the gluten is removed with the bran in the ordinary process. A mode of preparing wheat and rye grain for grinding into flour has been invented in Sweden, Switzerland, the object of which is to retain in the white flour the nutritive properties which have heretofore been lost in the separation of the bran. This process, invented by Herr Jacobson, of Stockholm, has been received with favor by scientific and practical men of Europe. It consists simply in moistening the wheat before grinding in a solution of caustic soda in water, the proportion of the liquid required for 1000 pounds of grain. The solution is prepared by dissolving 25 pounds of caustic soda in 125 pounds of water. The steeping, which occupies from twelve to twenty minutes, can be done in vats similar to those used by brewers. The caustic solution loosens the hull, so that it may be removed by the slightest friction, leaving the gluten with the body of the grain. The flour thus prepared is as white as the present ordinary flour, and contains all the highly nutritive properties of the Graham and bran bread.

If a friend should inquire if you knew who was the author of the familiar quotation, "Though lost to sight, to memory dear," you would, for the instant, be certain that you did, but an attempt to recall the name would perplex you. So of the lines we now quoted, "Consistency, thou art a jewel." All attempts to ascertain the authors of these quotations have failed.

At the late grand opening of costly fabrics at the store of A. T. Stewart, a magnificent collection of Gobelin tapestry was displayed, which was manufactured in Paris, and is valued at 40,000 francs. Expressed a view of the harbor of Marseilles, and is a wonderful piece of workmanship. It is composed of 1,200 single pieces for one year to produce a single square yard of tapestry, and it is always worked from the back ground, while the front is covered. The cloth is formed from single threads, and the covering is only observed in places to determine the proper blending of colors.

When will the time come for women to have the right to choose and costs in the matter of dress in spite of fashion? Some say she might do it now, if she would. Let her, then, the majority of men desire their own wives, daughters, and sisters to conform to the prevailing style. They may make fun of some fabulous fashion, or the ordeur, but for all that few of them would be pleased to escort a lady to an evening party who had chosen to dress merely as neatly, but without regard to fashion. The sad truth is, that we are all more or less governed by custom and fashion. Even the most sensible society do more than twothirds extravagances of the prevailing style. In the progress of ages the time may come when women will have a fashionable right to adopt certain individual modes of dress. The idea that the same style of bonnet, or the same mode of dressing the hair, is sufficiently becoming to be adopted by all ladies is simply absurd. If the popular taste were not warped we should ordinarily see those only, instead of masses of them, in the form of the head is often a prominent feature. Every head, as it always indicative of a characteristic individuality which is peculiar to it. This is entirely lost in the present style of hair-dressing. However, the probability is that the common sense of the people will not awake the natural growth that women are long will be compelled to curl their hair about in order to be in fashion. Therefore we may hope some time to see the natural shape of the head.

A placard having been put up at the Edinburgh College gate by the official who writes out such notices, reminding students that if they appeared at the funeral of Professor Simpson they should do so "in mourning," they felt insulted by such an instruction being practically addressed to their class, and therefore added to the placard, "Professors may attend in reefing jackets."

The French Countess De Begerien, under thirty years of age, has been perfectly native hair by the sudden effect of grief and anxiety while watching one night by the bedside of her dying child.

A curious "ice match" recently took place near San Francisco, to test the relative value of the two varieties of ice, one from Little Grass Valley, and the other from Boston. Two blocks, weighing each 500 pounds, were placed in the sun, with even chances, the merchants backing their favorite ice. "Time, the referee, chalk," says the report, "was broad and rather flat, but Little Grass Valley experience was strong and solid on one end." Toward noon, as the match became hot, and streams were trickled down the faces of the antagonists, "there was great excitement among the friends of the respective chunks," and bets ranged from 10 to 50. The Boston ice proved itself to have the best of it. Grass Valley showed deep furrows, and seemed to look the matter coolly and somewhat confident of victory. About the middle of the afternoon Little Grass Valley began to show signs of giving up, and to betting on how long Summit would last. It grew smaller, but more rounded, and the match against time had to be continued by the light of the moon. Summit beat Grass Valley 4 hours and 50 minutes, having 20 pounds remaining hands on the scales.

It is authoritatively stated that the French Empress has expressed her intention to offer in competition to the finest specimen of silk produces a prize of one thousand francs for the best fan, painted or carved, by a female artist under the age of 25. The fans are to be shown at the International Exhibition next year.

Rome has a new sensation in a theatrical production entitled "The Assassin Trappmann, or the Crime of Pardon." The piece appeared simultaneously at two theaters, and excited so much interest that tickets were at an enormous premium. The government, however, interfered after the second representation, and prohibited the repetition of the exciting tragedy.

There may be a certain attraction to some people in seeing and hearing a child of two years and ten months perform in public upon a miniature violin—an exhibition which took place not long ago in this city. But to a thoughtful person there is something very painful in the unnatural pressure to which such infant prodigies must be subjected.

THE "SEA MESSENGER."

THE little torpedo-like vessel, of which we give an illustration on this page, was invented recently by an Englishman, and is designed to be freighted with letters and papers belonging to a ship in danger of foundering at sea, or in any danger of being wrecked. It will, in such a case, serve as the best vehicle for the preservation of records and important documents, and in all probability for their conveyance, by favoring winds and tides, to some near or distant shore. It is certainly much better than the ordinary glass bottle, which may be fractured by any floating spar or fragment of wreck, or may be dashed to pieces by the wave casting it upon a rocky coast. The late cruel attempt to hoax the public with a forged message from the unfortunate City of Boston suggests another reason for the employment of a special floating conveyance for this purpose. If the City of Boston, or any ship that is missing, were known to be furnished with several of these contrivances, nobody could be deceived for a moment by the trick of putting a written scrap of paper into a bottle, and casting it into the sea with an inflowing tide. The water-tight and air-tight metallic hull of the "Sea Messenger," with its extreme buoyancy, will ride in safety through the most violent storms, and it has capacity to hold not only the ship's papers, records of the voyage, lists of the passengers and crew, but letters from those on board to their friends, wills, or draughts for money, or bills of exchange, or any other papers affecting their private interests. In case of a steamer being merely disabled, and drifting helplessly away, the "Sea Messenger," if thrown out and soon picked up by another ship, would perhaps direct assistance to proceed along the track where it was required. A vessel on a reef of rocks, or entangled and land-locked, not far from shore, might even be able to send, by this diminutive tender, a line of light cord to the people on land, who could then help the distressed crew with a rope. Other uses of this contrivance will become obvious with its more frequent trial in practice at sea.

SOLDIERS IN THE LUXEMBOURG.

DURING the vote on the plebiscite Paris was crowded with troops, in anticipation of popular disturbances, which the government was ready to suppress at a moment's notice, and at any cost of life. The illustration below represents the guard on the grand staircase of the Luxembourg Palace, where they passed the night of the Sunday on which the vote was taken. Events showed the wisdom of these precautions. Every attempt to bring about a popular demonstration was effectually put down without loss of time. The barricades were ludicrous failures. Whenever a cart or carriage came in the way the horses were coolly unharnessed by the mob, and the vehicles wheeled into the middle of the road and upset, paving-stones were torn up and piled in a heap between them, and building materials, and, in fact, any kind of rubbish, thrown on the top. Then, as soon as the cocked hat of a sergent de ville was perceived in the distance, the mob scampered off at full speed down the side streets, those who were unfamiliar with the quarter being usually the ones who were captured. Quite as much to this unusual display of the "better part of valor" by the populace as to the prudence of the military authorities, the Parisians were indebted for the tranquility of their city during the election.

WHO GOES THERE?

THE picture from which the engraving on this page is taken is considered one of the finest of MESSONIER's recent work. The chief characteristic of this popular artist—whose works are so eagerly sought after in Europe that it is rare to meet with them in this country—is his exquisite finish; and perhaps it is this quality quite as much as any other which causes his pictures to meet with such universal appreciation. His admirers are to be found all over the world, and extraordinary prices are realized even for his smallest and most trifling works.

MESSONIER was born in the French city of Lyons in 1815. At a very early age he determined to become an artist, and pursued his studies in Paris. His first pictures, exhibited in 1836, were "The Chess-Players" and "The Little Messenger," which attracted great attention by their delicacy and finish, as well as by the spirit and action with which the artist invested his miniature figures. Since that time he has devoted himself almost exclusively to small genre pictures, the subjects of which are generally similar to those selected by the Dutch and Flemish painters. Several of his works have found their way to this country, and have been exhibited in New York and other cities.

The picture which we have engraved is one of those artistic conceptions which leave a very wide field for the exercise of the spectator's fancy. We may weave twenty different stories about this gayly dressed but disconsolate gentleman. To our fancy he came forth on no warlike or hostile errand—nay, we think that past before the incident chosen by the artist the idea of danger or of a possible foe was not more present to his mind than it was to the mind of any gentleman engaged in courtly or amorous intrigues at an epoch when the rude logic of sword, pistol, and dagger was oftener used than it is at present. For, observe, his right hand has not had time to reach his sword, and his left hand still grasps a pencil-ful instrument, his riding cane. Yet evidently he scents danger, and not the danger of fair and even combat with an honorable foe. Rather, we should suppose, he hears the stealthy footfall of a possible assassin, or sees the tapestry quivering suspiciously as though a hidden figure were behind it. Let us hope that he will not imitate the rashness of the Prince of Denmark, cry "A rat! a rat!" thrust his trusty sword through the arras, and slay perchance some harmless eavesdropper.

EXTINGUISHED BELIEFS.

"MY friend SIR ROGER is often merry with me upon my passing so much of my time among his poultry.

On the occasion of this pleasantry the Spectator spent a month with the worthy knight at his country seat in Worcestershire, and there were grounds for the host's whimsical complaint that in that. What was said in the natural history books whose leaves the philosopher fingered? What were the facts that had fallen under his own grave eyes? He had not seen Goldsmith's "Animated Nature." The gentle author of that delicious piece of unreal reality was not born when the hands of the equally gentle CLIO had become cold and rigid, and were prevented by death from holding even the most cherished volume in their grasp again. But he had read of the giraffe, an Asian beast; and of the hyena, a subtle ravenous beast; and of the sea-devil, stomach on its back! Every body read of these things in ADDISON's time. They were in all the dictionaries, BAILEY's among them. And as for comparing these rare birds and beasts with what ADDISON had himself observed—listen. One of the soberest papers of the Spectator tells us that gentlemen birds "determine their courtship by the single grain or tincture of a feather;" that each intending bridegroom, as is repeated in verse,

"Cautious, with a searching eye, explores
The female tribes, his proper mate to woo,
With kindred colors mark'd."

Just, we suppose, as shopping ladies match silks, and wools, and ribbons, rejecting all that vary by the shadow of a shade! SO LOCKE (there is no mistake, it is veritably LOCKE of the Human Understanding) speaks acceptingly of what is "confidently reported of mermaids or sea-men." He refuses, modestly, to run his rapier through the whole notion, and whisk it off, exploded. He rather relished it. Perhaps he and ADDISON both gloried in the conception of vast oceanic nations, consisting of merwomen and mermen (with whom there must have been, of course, shoals of tender little water-babies), among whom there would have been employment for the raw fish they built believed in, described as a sea-fish having a sharp-toothed bone, like a saw, in his forehead, about three feet long.

To sail off WESTward—ho was something in the days of LOCKE, and ADDISON, and BAILEY; was something, too, in the days of Charles the First and the Covenanters. On the voyage it was expected that there would be seen flitting, magically, St. HERMES's fire—a sort of meteor appearing in the night on the shrouds of ships. In the case of the ship losing her course, she might be blown far southward, and get to mystic Magellanick Straits—a famous narrow sea—and her passengers might look out wonderingly (and perhaps not find) Magellan's Clouds—two small clouds not far distant from the south pole. And if unfavorable weather came, and the passage were long delayed, it is hard to say what miseries would have to be endured. The wretched people might have to devour dog, rat, shoes, and—by hot, and slowly—fellow-passengers; and then have to submit "on a miserable allowance per diem cut from a pair of leather breeches found in the cabin, reinforced with the grass which grew plentifully upon the deck!"

Well, Columbus being hailed, the eyes of two centuries ago expected to open to sights to which they were utterly unused. Strutting about, we may suppose, quickly, and in mighty fear, was to be found the agouty, a little American beast, like a rabbit. Astonting the air, was the flying tiger, an insect in America, spotted like the tiger. More in the fractures was the cocagon, a wild beast in America, having a skin under it like a sack, in which it carried its young ones; was, likewise, the tatoes, an American wild beast, covered with scales like armor; was the blowing snake, a sort of viper, in Virginia, which blew and swelled its head very much before it gave the bite; was, also, possibly (though its country is not specified), the cricket, a wild beast, called a crier, which made a noise like the crying of a young child. Truly, truly, ignorance is bliss, and it is folly to be wise!

his ducks and geese had more of his guest's company than he himself had. And why was this? We get the answer from ADDISON in his own person. He was "infinitely delighted," he tells us, "with those speculations of nature which are to be made in a country life." And he says further: "As my reading has very much lain among books of natural history, I can not forbear recollecting upon this occasion the several remarks which I have met with in authors, and comparing them with what falls under my own observation."

Humph! There is something to think about in a strange monster on the coasts of America; and of the pouta, a creature in America, so great a lover of men that it follows them, and delights to gran upon them. He had read, too, of the crusse, a fowl in America of a hideous form, having a bag under the neck which will contain two gallons of water; and of the yaudeu, the great ostridge in the island of Maragnana, a fowl that exceeds the stature of a man; and of lugs, a kind of fiery meteor which appears on men's hair, or on the manes of horses; and of the javalis, a swine in America, which has its

CORAL FISHING.

CORAL is met with in a large number of seas, mostly within short distances of the shore. The Mediterranean is the busiest of all seas for this kind of fishing. Perhaps the shores of the Mediterranean are thus the busiest because they have been longest known to civilized nations; but be this as it may, the coasts of Corsica, Sardinia, Sicily, Algiers, Majorca, Minorca, Balmatia, and Rhodes are especially rich in this product.

The fishery is conducted under certain well-defined conditions. The boats, which are in twenty men each, sail from certain ports at certain seasons, and remain for many months in the spot where the coral is to be fished up. The men are provided by the owner with food, clothing, and all necessaries, together with a certain amount of money-wages per month. Part of this money is paid beforehand to the father of the fisher or relative, to support them on shore while he is away. In many cases (perhaps most) the overseer or government of the adjacent land claims and receives a payment in the form of toll or royalty, for permitting the fishery to be carried on. The mode of fishing depends of course on the manner in which the substance is distributed. The coral is met with, not exactly on the sea bottom, but usually on the sloping sides of submarine rocks, where it presents itself in great quantities, and is often found more than half a yard high. It always selects a firm rocky bed to cling to, not mud or sand. The fishery arrangements are planned accordingly. In the Sicilian mode of fishing, which is pretty generally observed over the world, the actual locating or tracing is effected by means of two pieces of wood, crossed at the centre, and having a piece of net fastened to each of the four side of their extremities. A long cord is tied round the middle of the instrument, to hold it by, and an attached stone gives it weight enough to sink. The fisherman, holding the cord in his hand, guides the instrument to the place where it entangles the branches of coral in the meshes of the net, and gives a smart pull. The trunk or principal stem attaches itself more firmly to the rock that considerable force is required to loosen it; but the smaller branches snap more easily, and the fisher then has got his coral up to the surface. He sells it as quickly as possible; for it forms no part of his trade to sell it to dealers in ornaments and trinkets. As to the price, it is scarcely possible to name an average, where rough pieces would not bring a shilling a pound, while small choice bits would find eager purchasers at two or three times their weight in pure gold. This diversity of character results from the varying circumstances which affect the formation of the coral. When a branch of coral—living coral, as it may perhaps be correctly called—is torn from its submarine bed, and brought up to the surface, it presents a kind of bark, spotted with little tubercles or warts, and covered with a thick adhesive humor. The tubercles are the cells which contain, or have contained, the industrious zoophytes. The adhesive humor is the material from which the bark or skin is formed; and this bark, when solidified by age, hardens into a stony core of coral. The extremities of each branching shrub are small and tender, and contain little of the mineral substance for which the coral is almost exclusively valued.

LOVELINESS RESTORED.

WHY should faultless features be clouded with freckles, blotches, pimples, cold sores, or any species of eruption, when STAFFORD'S IRON AND SULPHUR POWDERS will remove the blemish? External applications are not only useless, but dangerous. The cause of all these disfigurations, etc., is in the blood. It lacks iron to give it vitality, and the action of sulphur to neutralize the acrid secretions. The powders, taken night and morning, will soon communicate a course through the superficial vessels, a glowing ruby stream, giving to the skin a delicate tinge of rose, and literally extinguishing the stains and evanescences referred to.

PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL

THE BEST AND SAFEST ILLUMINATING OIL.

Few people understand the dangerous character of Kerosene; the most careful are not safe, while the careless are constantly exposing themselves and others to danger. Statistics show that more deaths result each year from Kerosene Oil than from steamboat and railroad accidents combined. Will you, then, continue to endanger your own lives and your children's by using such oil?

PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL

Is intended to supply the want for a perfectly safe and reliable illuminating oil for family use, free not only from the danger of explosion, but from the danger of the fluid igniting should the lighted lamp become upset.

What It Is.—Astral Oil is a derivative of petroleum, produced by a new and improved process of manufacture, which gives it all the good without any of the objectionable qualities of ordinary refined kerosene. Explosion is guarded against, and families can burn our Astral Oil with the utmost assurance of safety as they can use tea.

Its Qualities.—It is perfectly pure, containing no moisture or chemicals. It gives a clear, uniform, and beautiful light, unequaled even by gas. It is free from offensive odor, and will not char the wick. It burns with great economy.

Its Safety.—The Astral Oil may be relied upon as non-explosive, and in every way perfectly safe to use. If, while burning, a lamp be upset and broken, the contents will not explode or take fire. To this end our Astral Oil has been chiefly directed, namely, to make that oil a fluid that can be made safe. In this particular our essence has been perfected.

An objection raised by some people against the Astral Oil is its cost. Consider this for a moment. Oil is one of the cheapest articles of household expenses. An ordinary family will burn, say, fifteen gallons per year (a liberal estimate). Our oil may cost 15 to 20 cents per gallon more than kerosene. Here, then is an additional expense of $2 00 to $3 00 per year, less than one cent per day, and for this small difference you are assured a clear, uniform, and beautiful light, together with the certainty of perfect safety. Is it not cheaper in the use of kerosene oil? If so, and you can insure the perfect safety of your family for $3 00 to $5 00 per year, and get a better article, should the small difference in cost stand in the way? You will not buy cheap flour, cheap butter, cheap coffee—if not good. Why will you buy cheap oil, which is both dangerous and worthless? Let the "Astral" be the ordinary oil in the house hereafter. We will guarantee this to oil as well as to other articles if satisfactory to you.

The oil is indorsed and recommended by the leading Professors of Chemistry in the country, and from the highest commendations from the most eminent scientific men in the country, and from thousands of private consumers.

THE AMERICAN AGRICULTURIST, Dec., 1869, says: "One of our associates had a glass wall-lamp, filled with this oil, full from its fastenings last week. It broke, and the oil, with the burning wick in it, spread over the floor, but no burning of the oil followed. The wick was blown out with the breath. He would not use any other oil now if this cost $2 a gallon—nor would we."

A FAIR TEST OF PRATT'S "ASTRAL" OIL.—On Wednesday night a little girl of Mr. H. H. Conklin accidentally knocked a lamp from the table, breaking it, and scattering the oil over her sisters, and upon the floor. The burner fell upon the floor with the wick burning, and Mrs. Conklin picked it up and blew it out, without lighting the oil or doing further damage. Had this been like it is a fair test of the "Astral" Oil, as will be ordinary oil the house would no doubt have burned down.—Red Hook (N. Y.) Journal, October 19, 1869.

MR. CHAS. PRATT, New York.

DEAR SIR,—I wish to add my testimony to the good qualities of the "Astral" Oil. A few nights ago, at my residence in Clifton, N. J., the servant girl accidentally knocked over a lighted lamp filled with your "Astral" Oil. The lamp fell to the floor and was instantly broken, and the oil, with the burning wick in it, spread over the floor, but no burning of the oil followed. I picked it up, and blew out the wick, without lighting the oil, and put it out of harm's way. The next morning, and has since been used in the family. I consider it perfectly safe, and would use no other. Yours, very truly,

CHARLES D. SPENCER.

With R. B. Claflin & Co., 140 Church St., N. Y.

New Brunswick, Canada, April 4, 1870.

MR. CHAS. PRATT:

DEAR SIR,—Right before last, as I was passing from the sitting-room to the kitchen with a lighted lamp in my hand (the lamp holding about a pint of your Astral Oil), my sleeve caught on the door-latch, and the lamp fell to the floor and was broken. The oil was scattered over the carpet, my dress and shoes, but did not ignite, and I picked up the wick, still burning and extinguished it without causing any damage. I think your oil perfectly safe, and wish to add my testimony to its good qualities. Yours, respectfully, MRS. A. TROP.

No one can afford to burn impure oils, however cheap; and if the small additional amount it costs to have a good and safe light be considered, it would seem as if the Astral Oil would be used by every family in the country.

The Astral Oil is for sale by Grocers and Druggists throughout the United States. Ask your dealer for it, and if he does not have it, address GIL MOORE PRATT,

The Life-Sustaining Organs.

The two organs which minister most directly to the support of the body are the stomach and liver. In the former the first process of digestion takes place, under the action of that powerful solvent, the gastric juice. Thence the food, converted into a pulpy mass, passes into the duodenum, where it is subjected to the action of the bile or gall flowing from the liver, and of the fluid generated by the pancreas, or sweetbread of the system. These several agencies separate the nutritious portion from the rest, and it is then taken up by the absorbent vessels and conveyed into the channels of circulation in the form of venous blood, while the waste matter is discharged through the bowels. Unless all these processes are duly performed, disease of some sort is inevitable, and the best of all medical agents for preserving or restoring the vital spark, and regulating the action of the three organs—the stomach, liver, and intestines—by which the three-fold work is carried on, is

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS.

Indigestion is generally accompanied by constipation, and the gentle cathartic operation of the Bitters is no less important in cases of this kind than the direct effect upon the stomach and the biliary gland. Beauty of person, as well as health, depends in no small degree upon the regularity of the excretive functions. A sallow complexion, a thick, pungent, coarse skin, a tainted breath, rush of blood to the head, loss of memory, headache, and extreme mental depression, are the usual accompaniments of costiveness. Some of the ills the Bitters will infallibly relieve and finally banish from obnoxious symptoms, when invigorating the stomach and promoting healthy action in the liver. This genial vegetable tonic and alterative will also prove at disease in its primary sources, the assimilating, secretive, and expulsive organs, and the cures it effects are consequently thorough and complete.

After thirty years' trial, the "PAIN KILLER" may justly be styled the great medicine of the world, for there is no region of the globe into which it has not found its way, and none where it has not been largely used and highly prized. Moreover, there is no clime to which it has not proved itself to be well adapted for the cure of a considerable list of diseases: it is a speedy and safe remedy for burns, scalds, cuts, bruises, wounds, and various other injuries, as well as for dysentery, diarrhœa, and bowel complaints generally. It is admirably suited for every race of men on the face of the globe.

A REPOSITORY OF

FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most rapid and wonderful ever known in the annals of journalism, and is recognized as the best and most attractive family paper published. As an illustrated chronicle of Fashion it is without a rival in this country. By a special arrangement, involving great expense, with the publishers of the Berlin Bazar—the leading journal of fashion in Europe—the choicest plates are published in New York simultaneously with their appearance in Berlin and Paris.

A large portion of the Bazar is never-week devoted to instructive and entertaining reading matter, including Stories, Sketches, and Original Sketches. The Editorial articles are always spicy, and cover every topic of social interest. No effort and no expense will be spared to permanently secure for the journal the victory which it has won so rapidly, and which it so well deserves.

Complete Patterns of the beautiful Paris Costumes in HARPER'S BAZAR, outside the regular Supplement, will be given in any number from 18 to 36 inches bust measure, with the names and directions for putting together, printed on separate sheets, so that every pattern will be sent by mail, postage prepaid to mail on receipt of Twenty-five Cents and the Number of the Pattern printed on the Label on the Wrapper. Dressmakers are supplied with the entire set of nine sizes at $2 00. Newsdealers supplied at the usual rates. In ordering, please specify the number of Bazar containing the set and which pattern is wanted.

In the BAZAR for April 16 was commenced "The Double Cousins," a serial story of thrilling interest, by the Author of "Cord and Creese," "The Dodge Club," &c., &c. Illustrated.

How to Look Young—Sixteen.

Don't paint or use vile Hair Restorers, but simply apply HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM upon your face, neck, and hands, and use LYON'S KATHAIRON upon your hair. The Balm makes your complexion pearly, soft, and natural, and you can't tell what did it. It removes freckles, tan, sallowness, ring-marks, moth patches, &c., and in place of a red, rustic face, you have the marble purity of an exquisite belle. It gives to middle age the bloom of perpetual youth. Add three effects to a splendid head of hair, produced by the Kathairon, and a lady has done her best in the way of adornment. READ THE FOLLOWING IMPORTANT Letter from Hon. THURLOW WEED.

GENTLEMEN,—

I have visited Saratoga annually FOR NEARLY FORTY YEARS, and during that long period I have kept the CONGRESS SPRING WATER continually at my residence, partaking of it TWO OR THREE TIMES A WEEK.

In my voyages to BERMUDA AND THE WEST INDIES, I have taken several doses with me. Indeed, NO FAMILY OUGHT TO CROSS THE ATLANTIC without Congress Water. I have MADE IT ON THE TROPICAL ISLANDS, in England, in France, in Germany, and in Italy, WITH THE SAME BENEFICIAL EFFECTS as when drawn fresh from the spring.

To me, Congress Water, aside from its medical qualities, is A DELIGHTFUL BEVERAGE.

It is so rare that we find in its medicine required to CURE THE "ILLS THAT FLESH IS HEIR TO" a pleasant beverage, that I cannot FOR YOU WILL SEND IT TO MANY THOUSANDS, who will gratefully remember you as public benefactors. Yours truly, THURLOW WEED.

"The Mystery of Edwin Drood."

It is stated that the story was finished before the First Part was put to press, and that the lamented death of MR. DICKENS will not delay its publication.

CHARLES DICKENS.

THE great story-teller is the personal friend of the world, and when he dies, his shadow falls upon every home in which his works were familiar and his name tenderly cherished. When the news came that DICKENS was dead, it was felt that the one man who was more beloved than any of his contemporaries, by the English speaking race of to-day, was gone. While he yet lay in his own house unburied, the thoughts of the whole civilized world turned solemnly to the silent chamber and gratefully recalled his immense service to mankind. What an amazing fame! What a feeling to inspire! When WALTER SCOTT was gone near his end, he said to his son-in-law LOCKHART, as it were the chief lesson of his accumulated experience—"Be a good man, my boy." Nothing else seemed important then. Charity, patience, love, these he saw in the dawn of heavenly light to be the only true accomplishment—the sole real successes. And who of all men that ever lived has done more to make men good than CHARLES DICKENS; and what praise so pure as that simple touch could be spoken by his open grave?

Within the last few days the simple story of his life has been read by millions of men and women. Yet nothing could be said of his genius and works that had not all of it, and it was because they had all felt it that his name was so dear. There was nothing obscure nor remote in his writing. Like HOMER, he touched the universal heart by appealing to the universal experience. When "Pickwick" was first published in parts for a little while to be popular all other literature. The ostler in the stall and the judge upon the bench, like truant school-boys, hid their tasks to read it. Its phrases and quaint terms became the current coin of general conversation. Its characters were at once and forever typical. Its pathos and humor were equally profuse and natural. Like "Pamela," and "Joseph Andrews," and "Waverley," "Pickwick" marked a new era in English literature. The great genial genius took the world upon his knee, and it listened delighted to the rollicking tale.

The supremacy which DICKENS achieved at the very first he never lost. He found BREWER, ARNOLD, and DISRAELI in possession of the field. During the thirty-three years of his career THACKERAY, MISS BRONTE, GEORGE ELIOT, KINGSLEY, CHARLES READE, MR. COLLINS, WILKIE COLLINS, MISS MULOCK, ANTHONY TROLLOPE, and their contemporaries appeared. Of these only one, THACKERAY, was ever mentioned as contesting the palm with DICKENS. But THACKERAY himself did not contest it. And whatever may be thought of their comparative literary art, whatever superior special pleasure individual readers may find in THACKERAY, that great master was never mistaken, and most sincere in recognizing with admiration the wonderful genius of DICKENS as genius, and the profound humanity of his influence.

THACKERAY, indeed, sometimes thought that DICKENS was quite generous enough to praise. "It took MR. DICKENS a great while to discover that I had written a book," said THACKERAY, once, with a laugh. But it was a discovery which he felt to be not quite just, and it disappeared long before his own death. They were both humorists, but the difference between them was too absolute to breed misunderstanding. THACKERAY was essentially of a melancholy and satirical temperament, a man of extraordinary insight; and his occasional impatience with the frolic extravagance of so profuse and exuberant a genius as that of DICKENS was easily understood. But the noble and generous words in which there two great contemporaries spoke of each other are universally known, and that there is one little anecdote, not so well known, which can never be so tenderly recalled as at this moment. When THACKERAY was dying, his friends, and among them the most noted of English authors, carried him to Kensal Green. There had been some estrangement between DICKENS and MARK LEMON, and as the coffin was lowered into its place, DICKENS stood upon one side of the grave and LEMON upon the other. As they raised their heads their eyes met, and instinctively putting out their hands, they clasped them in forgiveness, and their quarrel was buried in the grave of THACKERAY.

The affluence of DICKENS's genius was Shakespearean. He has enriched literature and general experience with more familiar characters, more current felicities of expression, than any other author, except the one greatest of all. Most great poets and novelists are known by a few creations; but those of DICKENS are a host, and his power was never more varied and admirable than in the story of "Edwin Drood," which is now publishing. Indeed, the tale so brims and sparkles with all his characteristic felicity that it seems as if he had resolved to prove that his greatest art had not been gained by the least sacrifice of freshness and vigor. Even at the very moment that the cunning hand was stilled forever forever, how many thousands of readers in England and America, as they finished the beautiful tenth chapter of "Edwin Drood," before declaring that DICKENS was never so delightful as in his latest work!

And as our friend, the friend of all honest men and women stumbling and struggling in the great battle, suddenly ceases from among us, we feel bound together by the tie of all of us than the sad decline of the good SIR WALTER, whose powers were slowly extinguished, one by one, before the end came, and who therefore could not hear of the end but with a tear of relief. Now we can perceive how prophetic was the feeling of sadness with which we watched DICKENS withdrawing from the platform at his last reading in Steinway Hall. At the evening, as he said, the shadow of one word had impended over us. He had not faltered for a moment; but, strangely, even Pickwick did not seem gay. The light of the friendly eyes had not been dimmed, but it had acquired an expressible affection for the man who had so cheered the weary and fainting hearts of thousands, who had so widely made his talent his talents, and who, evidently ill, was now passing from our sight forever, overpowered all other emotion. The vast audience sat wearying and tearful as, gravely bowing, and refusing all assistance, as if in that final moment he wished to confront alone, the beloved figure passed and lingered, and slowly retired. In that moment, after the long misunderstanding of years between him and his country, existed for a while by mainly and generous speech at the Press dinner, our hearts clasped his, as he and MARK LEMON grasped hands over the grave of THACKERAY; and henceforward and for all the future there was to be nothing in American hearts but boundless love and gratitude for CHARLES DICKENS.

AMERICAN NEUTRALITY.

WE write before the debate upon the Cuban question, but whether the majority or the minority report be sustained, a change in our neutrality laws is apparently imminent. The majority report holds that there is a war between Cuba and Spain: that there is a responsible and efficient revolutionary government in Cuba, and that the time has come officially to recognize that as a belligerent. The minority report disagrees with the other as to the facts, asserting that a revolution which has not a capital, a navy, a seaport, nor a vessel afloat, and does not really exist beyond the range except upon paper, is not a government entitled to a fixed and definite extent of territory and to a concession of belligerent rights. Such action, moreover, would give Spain rights of stopping and searching our vessels, which would be a very serious inconvenience, and might lead to war without any especial advantage to Cuba. The minority report speaks very plainly of the enormous jobbery in the Cuban revolution, and of the fact, which is very anxious that the government should espouse a cause in which the sympathizers do not seem disposed to risk either their property or their persons: and the minority recommend a bill modifying the neutrality laws.

It is a very important recommendation, because it is really a confession of the fact of our laxness. The custom of nations, which is called international law, and which was the work of powers that owned colonies, has always been to make the national authority was as supreme in the colony as in the mother country. Thus the authority of Great Britain was to be considered the same in Jamaica as in Kent. Consequently a rebellion in Jamaica was a revolt against the present power and not against a rebellion in Yorkshire, and must be treated by other nations accordingly. But in the revolt of the Spanish American colonies fifty years ago it was evident that Spain could arm herself in the ports against the colonies, but not the colonies against Spain; and after a vigorous discussion the Neutrality act of 1818 was passed, which forbade the fitting out of expeditions in our ports against any foreign prince or people or "any colony, district, or people with whom the United States are at peace with the British government, not with the inhabitants of Kent in England, whether they have revolted against Great Britain or not.

But the minority report proposes that the United States shall except from the general rule the American colonies of foreign powers.

Its bill is, as it says, "an enlargement of the principle known as the Monroe doctrine." Its ground is, "that in all struggles of American colonies against European domination, this government will not stop to inquire as to the extent or power of the revolutionary party: but the fact of an insurrection against the European power shall of itself entitle that insurrection to consideration; so that it shall be unlawful for an American to assist in its suppression." Nothing like this was asked for the European government that it is not lawful to do for the insurrectionary party." The object of neutrality laws is, of course, to secure the state that adopts them the utmost practicable neutrality between belligerents with whom it is at peace. Our own traditions in that respect are most honorable; nor have we hesitated to modify our laws, upon proper recommendation and proof that they were inconsistent with actual neutrality. That was done in 1817, upon the representation of the Minister of Portugal; and the very word, "colony, district, or people," were introduced into the act of 1818 at the suggestion of the Spanish Minister.

But the act of 1818 contemplates declared belligerents and recognized governments. The present proposition to modify it during a civil war in a friendly state, and not upon the representation of a recognized belligerent or of any other power, of course exposes us to the misconstruction of the friendly power. Such a change under such circumstances is, in WALKER's phrase, "a law of favor to one of the belligerent parties." In the present instance it is a change of the law to the disadvantage of Spain, and it is justified in the report by what is called "the Monroe principle," or the "Monroe doctrine." It is, indeed, a general law, applicable to all insurrections in all European or American colonies hereafter. But it is also a particular law affecting existing hostilities, and refusing to Spain the assistance which we have always afforded before in our ports, and granting privileges to the Cuban revolutionary party which it has not enjoyed. It differs from our general law in the reception of belligerent rights, because it does not expose our commerce to the search of either hostile party. Besides this, it is a very loud warning to the European proprietors in America that they are unwelcome. It has, therefore, the merit of frankness. It changes the Monroe doctrine from a declamation to a policy. It announces to all European powers that while we will not expel them from the American colonies of countries, yet that, by an exceptional neutral policy, we will cripple their efforts to retain them.

It is true that in the minority report, which suggests a change of the neutrality policy in favor of revolving American colonies, it is also declared that we will not recognize as a belligerent. The minority report disagrees with the majority. The latter suggests no change of the law, but merely asserts that the time has come when it ought to be recognized as a belligerent. The minority truly say that their proposition is quite as favorable to the revolutionary party in Cuba as that of the majority, and that it determines the future policy of the government. That it will displease the European powers, and will leave American colonies is inevitable, because it is a direct encouragement of insurrection against the parent state. But it may be conciliated by the very evident fact that such a modification of our traditional policy can not be considered unselfish, in view of the national prejudice in favor of annexation. Foreign states will think, and, as experience shows, not without reason, that we modify our laws, and relax the European hold upon the colonies, in order that we may make sure of them for ourselves. If it be the test of patriotism not to care what foreign states think of our policy, the debate is at an end. But if we wish that our policy shall be accepted wherever civilization is, we ought to be able to prove, what this report asserts but does not show, that it is for the general welfare that the English dominion of a power in its colonies should be recognized as essentially different from that authority at home.

WHEAT—ITS TRANSPORTATION TO FOREIGN PORTS.

THE considerable demand for our breadstuffs which has suddenly arisen in England and on the Continent imparts new interest to the question, What portions of the foreign imports of our grain to encourage every locality in the United States which can send it cheaply and in quantity? The policy which induces Baltimore houses engaged in importing grain to extend their operations to every wheat-producing country is applied to the United States in order to excite the most active competition among local sellers. The necessity for exciting this world-wide competition is due to the powerful efforts made in England to compel acquiescence with English limits, as fixed at Mark Lane and Liverpool. Those limits are adjusted on the strength of consular reports of the quantity and value of this produce in every commercial port, from publications made by writers of established reputation, who have access to that source of information, and from the judgment of the houses engaged in that trade as expressed in their mutual intercourse. The necessity for adjusting limits with precision is due to a variety of causes. The expenditure made by the English to foreign countries for food is enormous, perhaps in excess of a hundred millions of pounds sterling. This is expected to be repaid out of the profits of exports; and as the competition in the manufactures is exceedingly close, and a vast population is living from hand to mouth, who are obliged to diminish their consumption of food if the price exceeds their scanty means, every advance is opposed with tenacity. In their purchases from the United States they meet a class which practices the liberality which profusion allows, and which wants the protection of a sound currency. With abundant capital on the one hand and the need of it on the other, the steady aim of the English is generally successful. The present moment is one of the occasions, owing to the existence of a Continental demand in this market simultaneously with theirs, when they will be obliged to quit their stubborn ground, and advance their limits.

In this kind of trade our grain dealers located at New York, Chicago, and Milwaukee have derived immense advantage from intercourse with English agents, and particularly in regarding a merchantable quality to the grain which reaches the sea-board. At San Francisco a like service has been performed; and as the crop of wheat in California opens during the dry season it becomes cured with very little trouble. The English dislike to the rain, as its expense permits its being mixed with their moist wheat with great advantage. The same reason exists as to the rice which is imported, notwithstanding that the climate, in advance of the rainy season, is so favorable to perfect preparation for shipment. They prevent the shifting of cargo at sea, however, a principal object of their use.

When a train of wheat cars arrives at Milwaukee, canal-boat-load, as all dealers well know, undergoes examination, and is denominated No. 1, No. 2, No. 3, or rejected, according to its condition, and sent to the warehouse which stores wheat of its kind. The owner receives a certificate of storage, which he uses in the market, and which entitles the holder to the quantity and description of grain specified. The purchaser may not receive a single kernel of that which he has order deposited, as a matter of identity, as money does entered in a bank-book. When grain of either description reaches the New York dock the agent here of the foreign house which desires to purchase is obliged to subject it to another examination to see if it will stand the voyage to Liverpool or London. The success of these agents depends wholly on their care in examining wheat, so as to be certain that it will be in good order on the vessel's destination. They ordinarily have exchange to sell, in which they are aided by a reputation for accurate and conscious shipments. The great difficulty results from heating; but if it is allowed to dry on the farm, and is not subsequently exposed to undue moisture, no danger on ice is to be incurred, as it remains on sailing vessels only about thirty or forty days, and on steamers about a fortnight. Experienced shippers of flour well know. Frost is an important agency in this service, and is indispensable except when the voyage is of unusual length or under very favorable circumstances and there is no subsequent exposure.

St. Louis and New Orleans are acting together to export this grain to foreign countries; and it will be of advantage to the foreign purchaser if this can be done with safety. At the present time, when enlarged stocks are watered with freshets, and freights are reduced to cover the artificial capital, it would be highly beneficial to New York if a thorough and active competition could be established there for the transportation of breadstuffs could be established by way of the Mississippi. Far from this it would seem to have this article excluded. The Mississippi is one of the great avenues of communication which ought to be made available for the purposes of export.

One vessel, which sailed from New Orleans on the 14th of December last, with St. Louis wheat, arrived at Liverpool early on the 17th of March, and delivered her cargo in good order; but this was an exceptional case. Under the same conditions this may always be done, but they have been neglected, to the disadvantage of the trade. Wheat in condition at St. Louis is to be sent by railroad to New York might be far from the condition required for sending it by New Orleans. The shipments from St. Louis to Liverpool have generally been on domestic account. The presence of foreign dealers at St. Louis is required to stimulate to the same necessary to success. Whenever it shall be demonstrated that the trade can be conducted from New Orleans directly with the foreigner with advantage, the latter will establish the agencies at St. Louis which will secure its continuance. The disadvantages which, in the view of English houses, now exist, are the following:

1. They need to import annually from eighty to a hundred million bushels of wheat, and to distribute this importation over every part of the year, which would be impossible from a port supplied only for portions of the year with the article fully carried.

2. The want of activity at New Orleans throughout the whole year in this trade exposes each shipment to lying constant in costal vessels, without bins, containing cotton baled at a high temperature, from which damage is received.

3. The frosts of the region in the parallel of latitude of St. Louis occur later than do those of the wheat-growing countries northward of Milwaukee and Chicago; and when this agency is required to cure wheat, the latter can not be exported from New Orleans until late in December of the season of its growth.

4. The moisture of the atmosphere around St. Louis is greater than that of Minnesota.

It would strengthen the country immensely, and constitute a provision against a future short crop, if the farmers of the West shall acquire the beneficient habit of holding over a considerable part of their crop of wheat, instead of marketing the whole of it during the season of its growth. If this plan shall be adopted one of the disadvantages of New Orleans as a port of shipment for grain will be remedied, as in this case it would arrive there cured. This would be followed by the use of steam-vessels down the river, by rail and in the transfer at ports at New Orleans to sea-going vessels, and by the use of steamers in the transportation to England supplied with bins. Perhaps all this can be accomplished in very dry seasons by the use of extraordinary care in handling wheat immediately after its growth. The point to be aimed at is to put the grain in perfect condition before moving it from the farm. This can be accomplished with advantage by the following means. Inattention to this has produced a very decided impression among foreign dealers that shipments from St. Louis by way of New Orleans are attended with risk. If this idea is erroneous, the results of recent shipments by an association of public-spirited citizens of St. Louis—to whom great credit is due—can be so presented as to remove the impression, and convince the foreigner that the trade may be safely prosecuted.

PARTY DISCIPLINE.

THE government of every free country must be carried on by parties. The experience shows that parties may often be managed by unprincipled men, whom honorable and intelligent citizens can not follow. Every man of party, however, is to surrender the victory to the enemy. What, then, is an honest man to do? This is a question which is often very practical and very perplexing. The mainspring of our political machinery is the primary meeting. Its work is apparently not important, and generally disagreeable. But whoever controls the primaries nominates the candidates and dictates the policy of the party. It is the imperative duty, therefore, of every honest voter to attend the primaries. But if he does not ought he, therefore, as an honest man, to countenance and support every thing that is done there by men who are not so honest? If, by his omitting to do his duty, affairs have taken a wrong direction, does it become his duty to help them go wrong? Because, by our neglecting to hatch the grub we do not become into the garden, shall we take a whip and drive them still further in? There would seem to be no question of what should be done. But, practically, as we said, there is often very serious perplexity.

A party, if it would be successful and efficient, must be well organized. It must be vigilant, energetic, and united. To secure its useful activity a great deal of disagreeable work or details is indispensable. Every member, therefore, must be held to his allegience, often when it costs labor and trouble, to the interests of the public welfare which is at stake. From the necessity of the case, also, his duty will often seem to be between supporting objectives. At a critical election—and every election in a party system is critical, because, if the dominant party loses its ascendency, disorganization is sure to follow—at a critical election, for instance, the voter finds himself at the polls with the regular nomination in his hand, and the regularly nominated candidate is, in the voter's judgment, a dishonest and doubtful man. To scratch him is to diminish the party chance by one vote. To substitute another name is, effectively, the same as scratching. But to lessen the chance of your own party is to increase that of the other. Yet the success of the other leads to the adoption of a policy which the voter believes to be disastrous to the general welfare. What shall he do? Shall he vote for the "scalawag," who seems likely to be supporting his own party policy, or shall he refuse to vote, upon the presumption that a dishonest man can not be trusted? Yet, again, in politics, is not that an unsound generalization? Are not the "scalawags," as a rule, quite as likely to be steadily faithful to the extreme party policy?

Again, what shall he do? In a speech before the election of General GRANT, Mr. BRECKINRIDGE was reported to have said that he did not believe that the General was an honorable man; "but I am free to say," he added, "that if it were so, I had rather have General GRANT remain than Governor SEYMOUR solect." Shall the party man, the Republican, for instance, go further, and say that he would rather have a Republican than an honest Democrat? With the American who says that both parties are equally bad, and all politicians equally corrupting, and that decent men are hopelessly stain from politics, there is, of course, no argument. He probably thinks that he says a very wise thing at the primaries when he votes for an unpiciously foolish. For if the government must be managed by party, and both parties are equally bad, the story of the fox and grapes is plain enough. It is to fight with corruption.

But the honest party man need not be so overly perplexed as he often is. Honesty, we mind, the stars are undisturbed. There are certain principles which are very clear, and which do not change. The first of these is this, that no cause can ever long prosper in corrupt hands. The reason may be that their action will be therefore more likely to arouse other reason; but the essential fact is, that the intelligent and honorable friends of the cause will, under such circumstances, withdraw their support and sympathy. They will feel that the cause is more imperiled by such friends than by open enemies. And in every case they will prefer to risk the present defeat of the party, with all the demoralization of which we have spoken, than their disintegration. Their course, therefore, is plain. Recognizing the necessity of parties and the value of organization, they will vote with the party organization which the best, and therefore the most influential and permanently powerful, members of the party can be certain to form the organization is the policy of honesty. Honest candidates must be nominated to sustain honest measures founded upon the true principles; and the only way in which those who do not go to the primaries can influence the action taken there is by voting and by the choice of party candidates. If the managers nominate scallawags at the party primary, let the party voters repudiate them at the polls. That is a lesson which party managers can understand. And when, under such circumstances, the party is defeated, it is betrayed not by those who stay away from the primaries, but by those who go; not by those who decline to vote for scallawags, but by those who vote for them.

This is especially true of the Republican party, because it is composed of the great mass of the honest and intelligent native voters. "You're not a Democrat," lately said one member of that party to another, "for you scratch the ticket." Mr. SPEAKER COLFAX will be regularly nominated—as he often is!—has long been a cardinal doctrine of that party. But very many of the quietly and steadily Republican party in the city of New York, for instance, is due to the fact that while many of the candidates are not generally honored, they can not nominate them are; and it is not believed that their work is honest work. There are, perhaps, a dozen men who constantly appear in the lists of committees and meetings who are not trusted by honest Republicans. They manage every thing, and claim the right to rule or ruin; and every sincere Republican shall feel himself bound in honor, and for the sake of the party, to sustain the "regular" ticket when done by them. Whoever wishes to continue their rule will support their action; and, as we said last week, with the same result. The party in fact will only be displaced by those who show themselves their masters.

Meanwhile the great body of the Republican party in the State and in the country, which does not concern itself with the details of management and only votes, may feel the party in no way so effectively as by an unsparing repudiation of the work of leaders whom it does not trust. That is the only practicable remedy and it can enthusiastically support. And to all cries that such a course is injurious to the party there is one overwhelming reply, namely, that any other course is fatal to the party.

THE RETIREMENT OF GENERAL RAASLOFF.

THE contemptuous disregard by the Senate of the St. Thomas treaty, which the United States persistently urged upon Denmark, led, as was unavoidable, to the rejection of the Danish Minister of War and of the Navy, General RAASLOFF, who had been very active in the negotiation. In the speech in which he explained to the Rigsdag the reasons of his resignation, General RAASLOFF alluded to this country with a dignity and reserve that make his words all the more impressive. He spoke of his long residence here as a Minister, and said that he had "formed a very high opinion of the character of the American people. I have learned to appreciate them, and believe them to be honest and high-minded." It was, as he says, his friendly feelings for the United States that caused him to assert confidently that they would faithfully and conscientiously fulfil every obligation which they might have incurred. When difficulties arose here in regard to the ratification, General RAASLOFF, at the request of his Government, came at once to the United States to explain the Danish view of the negotiation. "It was during that stay in Washington," he says, "that I became fully aware how much I had exposed myself on behalf of the United States.....I had gone so far that if the people for whom I had vouched should leave me in the lurch, the blow for me would be very severe, and would be one of those events which take away, at least for a time, a man's vigor and courage, his confidence in himself, as well as a faith in those things which we ought to be able confidently to rely upon."

The retiring Minister, undoubtedly one of the ablest statesmen in his country, says nothing whether. But we, who have seen our national reputation compromised by this affair, ought to feel all the more deeply his manly dignity, nor should ourselves to be blinded to the fact that our conduct has warned every nation that it can not safely listen to the diplomatic overtures of the foreign department of our Government.

STRANGERS IN THE GALLERY.

IT is an illustration of the anomalies in the British system, which are so clear to John Bull, that the gallery of the House of Commons is not open to the public. Those who sit there are there solely by sufferance, and if any member calls attention to their presence they must go. But this is very seldom done. The rule is a relic of another theory of the government than that which now prevails. Recently, however, in the debate on the Contagious Diseases act, Mr. CRAWFORD rose, and said, "Mr. Speaker, I beg to call your attention to the fact that there are strangers in the gallerize." There was a loud protest upon the part of the House, and an appeal to him to withdraw his notice. But he would not, and the gallery was cleared of all strangers, including the reporters.

We believe that until now this has not happened for nearly forty years. The last instance that we recall was the famous stroke of O'CONNELL's, which Mr. DUFFERIN tells so well in his lecture. When O'CONNELL came to Parliament the London Times ridiculed and treated him à l'Yeux. But without refrain from crowing him. So in the evening, when O'CONNELL rose to speak, the thirteen reporters leaned on their elbows and held up their pencils, as if to show that they were not going to take down the speech. Mr. O'CONNELL remarked quietly, "Mr. Speaker, I observe thirteen strangers in the gallery." The reporters were put out, and there was no report of the debate in the next day's Times. But the next day the London Times cried "quarter," and said, "if Mr. O'CONNELL will give up the quarrel, we will."

Mr. DUFFERIN says also that when the House afterward renewed its hostility and ridicule, one of its reporters crossed to Ireland to give an account of the proceedings of the Repeal meetings. This was so much exasperated that on one occasion the reporter felt himself in personal peril. But O'CONNELL took him under his care, protected him at breakfast, carried him to the meeting, placed him near him upon the platform, and sent for a full report of his accommodation. "All ready?" said O'CONNELL. "Yes," replied the reporter. "Pencils enough for a long speech?" "Oh yes," was said the reporter. "Now, then," said O'CONNELL, and turning to the audience he addressed them in Irish.

WILKIE COLLINS.

IT gives us pleasure to announce that Mr. WILKIE COLLINS has written a dramatic version of his powerful and interesting novel "Man and Wife," for performance in the United States as well as in England. The play will be in four acts—the first three acts closely following the book, and the fourth act containing a new conclusion to the story, invented by the author with a view to stage necessities and dramatic effects. Mr. COLLINS has already appointed an agent to represent him in this country, who will in due time communicate with dramatic managers on the subject. Few novels are more capable of dramatic treatment than this admirable work, or are written more vividly and characters and situations of exciting interest.

NOTES.

MR. E. JOY MORRIS, of Pennsylvania, our late Minister to Turkey, who returns after a long and honorable service, is worthily succeeded by Mr. WAYNE MACVEAGH, of the same State. It is a most admirable appointment, for Mr. MACVEAGH is a gentleman of the highest character and accomplishment, and of recognized ability. He is a lawyer by profession, and of great political experience and sagacity. He was Chairman of the Republican Committee during some of the most critical periods of the rebellion. Mr. MACVEAGH is well added to the ranks of a service which includes Mr. MOTLEY, Mr. MARSH, Mr. JAY, Mr. BANCROFT, and Mr. WASHBURN; a service which, as a whole, was never more worthily and honorably filled than under President GRANT'S Administration.

WE are very glad that Mr. WILLARD'S bill, granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of 1812 that survive, and to the widows of those that are dead, has passed the House, and we trust that there may be no delay in the Senate. There have been many unjust matters, upon the taxpayers for such a bill, and it should have become a law long ago. There are not many of this old guard, and we have had ample experience of the value of such services. There has seemed to be recently a culpable indifference to the claims of the soldiers and sailors, a willingness to be severe, even to harshness; and we therefore rejoice that in this instance the generous spirit that animated the little debate upon this proposition, and the promptness with which it was adopted.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

June 6.—In the Senate, the thwart introduced a bill to prohibit contracts for service labor, expiate by that the bill was intended to apply to cases of land grants.—In the House, the bill to reduce taxation was passed.

June 7.—In the Senate, the Indian Appropriation bill was considered.—An amendment to revise the Osage Indians in Kansas, and provide for the sale of their reservation, was rejected, yeas 19, nays 20.—The House was occupied with the Currency bill, but took no action.

June 8.—There was no interesting debate in the Senate on the San Domingo treaty.—Mr. HOWARD, of Michigan, introduced a resolution declaring that as an American citizen had been violated by the murder recently committed, unjustifiably arrested, wounded, and sentencing him to death; and that his release had been prevented by General SHERIDAN. Mr. HOWE presented the memorial, asserted that General HOLBERT had stated that the imprisonment of Mr. HOLCH was necessary to prevent him from divulging objections to the ratification of the San Domingo treaty, and moved the reference of the matter to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instructions to send for persons and papers. Objection being made to reference to that committee, the matter was referred to the Committee on Judiciary.—In the House, the Indian Appropriation bill was taken up, and the amendment for the removal of the Osage Indians from Kansas was agreed to.—In the House, the consideration of the Currency bill was resumed, but no amendments were offered, when Mr. Eldridge, for the purpose of killing the bill for the session, moved to adjourn. The motion prevailed, 79 to 78. The effect is to carry the bill over to the next session in United States court.

June 10.—The Senate was engaged in discussing the bill to abolish the franking privilege. Mr. MORRILL, in the course of a speech against the bill, advocated a reduction in letter postage to one cent. Mr. CASE, on the same subject, said that he would be sorry to see the franking privilege abolished, but specifically.—A recess was occasioned in the House by the arrest and arraignment of a newspaper correspondent charged with a libelous attack on Mr. Fitch, of Nevada. The House, after the recess, was reassembled to hear the decision of the Speaker.

June 11.—In the Senate, an appropriation of $50,000 was passed for the completion of the Washington obelisk now at Washington.—In the House, Mr. Butler asked leave, which was refused, to introduce a bill repealing the Tenure-of-Office act. The Senate amendment to the Appropriation bill for the payment of clerks in the departments on the same footing as male clerks in respect to pay was adopted.

GENERAL NEWS ITEMS.

William Gilmore Simms, the Southern novelist, died at the residence of his son-in-law, in Barnwell, South Carolina, on Saturday, June 11, aged sixty-four years.

The Western Union Telegraph Company reports, to day, June 11, rejected the proposition to give the balance in women at the vote of 1 to 5½.

A Harrisburg (Pennsylvania) dispatch says the rebel flags captured by Meade's army at Gettysburg and buried in the Susquehanna River were carried away large quantities of timber. It is estimated that 10,000,000 feet have floated out.

The election in Georgia has gone Democratic by a large majority. This insures the election of a Democratic United States Senator from that State.

The Union and Democratic Herald, issued at Wilmington, North Carolina, since last fall, has been rejected by order of the Military Governor. The proprietor chose for the United States, Mr. Fernando Maciu, has given notice of announcing to $50,000 that the editor engage in hostilities against Spain, or otherwise violate the neutrality laws of the United States.

FOREIGN NEWS.

On Sunday, June 8, a terrible conflagration broke out in Constantinople, in the course of which over 800 buildings were consumed. The fire commenced in a hotel to be frightful. Whole families were hemmed in by the flames and some potash, and perished in view of the spectators, who were unable to afford the slightest relief. The fire was finally subdued by means of a high gale, and the progress of the flames was thereby checked, but not without much effort. Many of the Turks, under the influence of fatalism, shut themselves in their burning houses, and refused to be rescued. The dead are ascertained to be 250. The French Empress has sent 10,000 francs to Constantinople for the relief of the sufferers.

It is reported that Mr. Disraeli is to be raised to the peerage.

Count Bismarck's health is still quite delicate, and his physicians have ordered him to remain still a week, and recommend a trip to England.

It is reported that Mr. Carlyle is about to make a visit to this country.

THE SÄNGERFEST BUILDING.

WE give on this page a view of the great Sängerfest building just completed in Cincinnati, in which the next Industrial Exposition will be held. It is built entirely of wood, but very strongly arched and braced, on an excellent stone foundation, and ornamented, as shown in our sketch, by two front towers at the angles, front porch and balcony, and many a neat pinnacle and surmount.

This splendid hall, in which a grand German Sängerfest was held on the 16th, 17th, and 18th of June, will seat 10,000 spectators, 1300 singers, and an orchestra of 300 performers. Two-thirds of the weight of this mass of humanity will rest directly on the first-floor, directly over the foundation, while the galleries are strongly supported and braced, so that the liability to accidents is very slight. Architecturally considered, the building is very handsome. At each corner a tower rises to the height of 110 feet from the ground. These towers at the base form a part of the main building, and above it gradually recede, and terminate in pinnacles, from which the American and German flags will be suspended. The towers will be covered with tin, and relieved with large double and triple windows below, and by triple windows hidden by Venetian blinds above. On the first-floor, between the towers, on the front, six arches, each nine feet wide and eighteen feet high, open into a vestibule sixty-six feet long and ten feet wide. Above these arches is the balcony, of the same dimensions as the vestibule. This balcony opens by a large door into the front gallery. On each side of the latter are double windows, to relieve the front and give additional light to the audience-room.

It was at first designed to ornament the interior in a very elaborate and costly manner, but the project was abandoned.

THE NEW MASONIC TEMPLE.

THE ceremony of laying the corner-stone of the new Masonic Temple to be erected in this city, at Twenty-third Street and Sixth Avenue, took place on Wednesday, the 8th of June, in the presence of a vast gathering of people. The day was remarkably fine. At an early hour the different bodies of the fraternity assembled in their lodge-rooms, and promptly at half past eight the several divisions, carrying guidons numbered from one to ten, were posted in the positions assigned to them along Fifth Avenue. The number of Masons in the procession was estimated at nearly 20,000. At nine o'clock the procession moved to the site of the edifice, where it divided into two lines, through which the Grand Lodge, forming the tenth division, passed. The masters and wardens of the various lodges then followed in the rear of the Grand Lodge officers, according to seniority; and, after these officers had passed through the line, the brethren marched in the same order, and closed up en masse around the platforms, the lodge officers being allowed inside the inclosure, which was so constructed as to form a lodge, the platform in the east for the principal grand officers being raised on three steps, that in the west for the Senior Grand Warden on two, and that in the south for the Junior Grand Warden on one. The corner-stone was in the northeast corner, and by its side was the original corner-stone of the old Masonic Hall that stood in Broadway, near Anne Street, in which was the box containing the articles deposited when that stone was laid. The old box, with its contents, was replaced in the old stone, and it was set by the side of the new one. The two are laid on a foundation 22 feet deep, built on a bed of concrete and masonry.

After the opening ceremonies and prayer the Grand Treasurer placed in a metal casket the various offerings, documents, etc., the Grand Secretary announcing each article as it was deposited. The casket was then sealed up and laid in the lower corner-stone. This stone is five feet eight inches long, by three feet four inches broad, and two feet four inches deep. The casket having been deposited, a copper plate, having the engraved names of the grand officers, and the occasion which called for it, was placed over the box and fastened down, after which the covering stone, four feet four inches long, by three feet four inches broad, and one foot four inches deep, was lowered upon it. This having been done under the direction of the Grand Master, the Deputy Grand Master applied the square, the jewel of his office, to the stone, and pronounced the work square. The Senior Grand Warden applied the level to the stone, and reported that it was level. The Junior Grand Warden next applied the plumb, and reported that it was plumb and upright. This work having been completed, the Grand Master took the trowel and spread the cement which bound the whole, and having struck the stone three times with his gavel, returned to his station, and made the following declaration, which was repeated three times by the Grand Marshal, in the south, west, and east:

"We, James Gibson, Grand Master of Masons in the State of New York, do declare this stone to be plumb, level, and square; to be well formed, true, and trusty; and duly laid according to the ancient customs, usages, and forms of our craft."

The stone was then formally consecrated with offerings of corn, wine, and oil, in accordance with Masonic usages.

We now turned due south from our camp of Delhúlik, and at a distance of twelve miles we reached the river Royán, the bed of which was completely dry. We descended the bank in a spot that had been broken down by elephants, and continued our course up stream along the sandy bed, which formed an excellent road. The surface was imprinted with the footsteps of every variety of game, and numerous holes about two feet deep had been dug in the sand by the antelopes and baboons to procure water. Great numbers of the oterop, a small reddish-brown antelope without horns, were drinking at these little watering-places, and did not appear to heed us. We disturbed many nellut and tétel upon the banks, and after having marched about four miles along the river's bed, we halted at a beautiful open forest of large trees at the junction of Hor Mai Gubba. This was a considerable torrent, which is tributary to the Royán; at this spot it had cut through a white sandstone cliff, about eighty feet perpendicular: thus upon either side it was walled in. The word Gubba is Abyssinian for the Nabbúk, therefore the torrent was the Nabbuk River: this flowed past the village of Mai Gubba, which is the head-quarters of Bek Nimmur, from which we were not twenty-five miles distant. We camped in a forest of the largest trees that we had as yet seen in Africa.

I took a few men to beat the low jungle within the forest for francolin partridge, numbers of which I had seen running through the covert. I went up the dry bed of the river at the junction of the Hor Gubba, while they drove toward me, and I was compelled to fire as fast as I could load, as these beautiful birds flew across the ravine. I shot five brace almost immediately. There is no better game bird than the francolin: the flesh is white, and of a most delicate and rich flavor. My shots had attracted the aggaggers, and shortly after my return to camp they arrived with my Arabs, as they had been stationed on the opposite side of the Royán in a forest within a quarter of a mile of us. I agreed to have a long day's hunt the next day with Taher Sheriff.

TÉTEL IN DANGER.

According to my agreement, I went to the aggaggers' camp at 5 A.M., with Hadji Ali and Hassan, both mounted on my two horses Aggubi and Gazelle, while I rode Tefel. Taher Sheriff requested me not to shoot at any thing, as the shots might alarm and scare away elephants; therefore I merely carried my little Fletcher, in case of meeting the Baré, who hunted in this country. We started along the upward course of the Royán.

For seven hours we rode, sometimes along the bed of the river between lofty overhanging rocks, or through borders of fine forest trees; at other times we cut off a bend of the stream, and rode for some miles through a beautiful country diversified with hills, and abounding in enormous baobab-trees. At length we entered the mountain at the foot of the great chain. Here the views were superb. The Royán was no longer a stream of ninety or a hundred yards in width, but it was reduced to a simple mountain torrent about forty yards across, blocked in many places by masses of rock, while at others it had formed broad pools, all of which were now perfectly dry, and exhibited a bed of glaring sand. Numerous mountain ravines joined the main channel, and the entire country bore witness to the effect of violent rains, as the surface was torn and watered.

HUNTING A RHINOCEROS.

We had ridden nearly thirty miles, having seen large quantities of game, including antelopes, buffaloes, giraffes, and rhinoceros, none of which we had hunted, as we were in search of elephants. This was the country where the aggaggers had expected, without fail, to find their game.

They now turned away from the Royán, and descended a sandy valley at the foot of the mountains, the bottom of which appeared to have been overflowed during the wet season. Here were large strips of forest, and numerous sandy watercourses, along the dry bed of which we quickly discovered the deep tracks of elephants. They had been digging fresh holes in the sand in search of water, in which welcome losing we found a good supply; we dismounted, and rested the horses for half an hour, while the hunters followed up the tracks on the bed of the stream. Upon their return they reported the elephants as having wandered off upon the rocky ground, that rendered further tracking impossible. We accordingly remounted, and, upon arrival at the spot where they had lost the tracks, we continued along the bed of the stream. We had ridden about a mile, and were beginning to despair, when suddenly we turned a sharp angle in the water-course, and Taber Sheriff, who was leading, immediately reined in his horse, and backed him toward the party. I followed his example, and we were at once concealed by the sharp bend of the river. He now whispered that a bull elephant was drinking from a hole it had scooped in the sand, not far round the corner. Without the slightest confusion the hunters at once fell quietly into their respective places, Taber Sheriff leading, while I followed closely in the line, with my Tokroonis bringing up the rear; we were a party of seven horses.

Upon turning the corner we at once perceived the elephant, that was still drinking, at the shallow extremity of the water-course. Before a word could be spoken, the fire that had cleared the country we had hitherto traversed had been arrested by the bed of the torrent. We were thus plunged at once into withered grass above our heads, unless we stood in the stirrups; the ground was strewed with fragments of rock, and altogether it was ill-adapted for riding. Nevertheless Taber Sheriff broke into a trot, followed by the entire party, as the elephant was not in sight. We ascended a hill, and were near the summit, when a cloud of dust appeared about eighty yards ahead, It was looking behind during its progress, and swinging its large head from side to side, and upon seeing us approach, it turned suddenly round and bellowed. "Be ready, and take care of the rocks!" said Taber Sheriff, as I rode forward by his side. Hardly had he pronounced the words of caution, when the bull gave a vicious jerk with its head, and with a shrill scream it charged down at full speed in our direction. Away we all went; holter-skelter, through the dry grass, which shielded in my case only my legs, as I was riding bareback, with the elephant tearing after us for about a hundred and eighty yards at a tremendous pace. Then it was a sure-footed horse, and, being unshod, he never slipped upon the stones. Thus, as we all scattered in different directions, the elephant became confused, and relinquished the chase; it had been very near on one time, and, in open ground, I was not sorry when it gave up the hunt. We now quickly united, and again followed the elephant, that had become more retrograde. Advancing at a canter, we shortly came in view. Upon seeing the hunters the bull deliberately entered a strong-hold composed of rocky and uneven ground, in the clefts of which grew thinly a few leafless trees the thickness of a man's leg. Here it stood boldly toward us, and stood determinedly at bay.

Now came the tug of war! Taber Sheriff came close to me and said, "You had better shoot the elephant as we shall have to ride sharply in this rocky ground." this I declined, as I wished to end the fight as it had now commenced, with the sword; and I proposed that he should endeavor to drive the animal to more favorable ground. "Never mind," replied Taber, "Inshallah" (please God) "he shall not beat us." I was now advised me to keep as much as him as possible, and to look sharp for a charge.

The elephant stood facing us like a statue: it did not move a muscle beyond a quiet and restless action of the eyes, that were watching all sides. Taber Sheriff and his young son Ibrahim now separated, and each took opposite sides of the elephant, and then joined each other, about twenty yards behind it; I remained with them, until Taber advised me to keep about the same distance upon the left flank. My Tokroonis kept apart from the scene, as they were not required. In front of the elephant were topping rocks, from whom we the elephant would charge Sheriff, with the withered arm. All being ready for action, Taber now rode forward, followed by the lame of the cunning old bull, who was quietly awaiting an opportunity to make certain of some one who might give him a good chance.

Rodur Sheriff rode a bay mare, that, having been thoroughly trained to these encounters, was perfect at her work. Slowly and cautiously we advanced toward her wary antagonist, until within about eight or nine yards of the elephant's head, as the creature never moved, and the wise ex sonus was beautiful; not a word was spoken, and we kept our guns loaded after rifling. Suddenly, and at length broken by a short from the mare, who gazed intently at the elephant, as through watching for the moment of attack.

One more pace forward, and Rodur sat coolly upon his mare, with his eyes fixed upon the gazelle, with the monkey-like form of little Rodur Sheriff leaning forward, and looking over his left shoulder as the elephant rushed after him.

For a moment I thought he must be caught. Had the mare stumbled, all were lost; but she gained in the race after a few quick bounding strides, and Rodur, still looking behind him, kept his distance so close to the elephant, that its outstretched trunk was within a few feet of the mare's tail.

Taber Sheriff and his brother Ibrahim swept down like falcons in the rear. In full speed they dextrously avoided the trees, until they arrived upon open ground, when they dashed up close to the hind-quarters of the furious elephant, who, maddened with the excitement, heeded nothing but Rodur and his mare, that were almost within its grasp. When close to the tail of the elephant, Taber Sheriff's sword flashed from its sheath, as a gray flash, and Rodur he leaped nimbly to the ground, while Ibrahim caught the reins of his horse; two or three bounds on foot, with the sword clutched in his right hand he was close behind the elephant; a bright glance shone like lightning, as the sword fell upon the hamstringing steel; this was followed by a dull crack, as the sword cut through skin and sinews, and reached deep in the bone, about twelve inches above the foot. At the next stride, the elephant halted and short in the midst of the withered grass. Taber had jumped quickly on one side, and had vaulted into the saddle with his naked sword in his hand. At the moment that Taber had led the chase, turned sharp round, and again faced the shrieking wife. Without dismounting from the saddle, he picked up the hind foot from a handful of dirt, which he threw into the face of the victorious elephant, that instantly attempted to rush upon him. It was impossible: the foot was dislocated, and the leg was of no use for a full stride. In an instant, Taber was once more on foot, and again the sharp sword flashed like sunbeam, and the leg of the elephant could not move; the first cut with the sword it the ham-string; the last severed the tendo Achilles; the arteries of the leg were divided, and the blood spouted in jets from the wounds. I wished to mount my horse, as the bullet behind the ear, but Taber Sheriff begged me not to fire, as the elephant was not dead to death of pain, and an unnecessary shot might attract the Basi, who would steal the tusks and carry off the ivory. We were obliged to return immediately to our far-distant camp, and the hunters resolved to commence their operations upon the next day.

On the following day the hunters started to the dead elephant with mules and sacks, but they returned at night thoroughly disgusted; the nimble Basi had been before them, most probably attracted by the report of the shot. A cloud of vultures that had gathered in the air. Nothing remained but the skeleton, from which the hyenas had torn the flesh and the ivory had been stolen. The rocks of a great number of men were left upon the ground, which had evidently been a fortress to return without an attack from overwhelming numbers.

On the way to Gallabat.—Encampment on a vast Plain. —From the Blue Nile.—The Hamran Arabs.—Camp at Ravine.—Tetel is led to the Foot of the Hill.—He is brought to Bay.—The Encounter.—The Tokroonis receive a Bullet.—Pursuit of the second Rhinoceros.—The Chase.—Tetel at Bay.—Death of the Rhinoceros.—Their Industry.—On the Banks of the Atbara.—Arrival at Khartoom.—Conclusion.

I had thoroughly explored the beautiful country of the Salaam and Angrab, and intended to push on to Gallabat, the frontier market-town of Abyssinia.

We started on the following afternoon, and with Hassan as our guide, and Taber Noor upon a camel, my wife and I centered ahead of the main body, upon a high ridge that rose, accordingly, firm ground. Upon arrival at the summit, we had a lovely view of the surrounding country, and we encamped on a vast plain, secret into a vast plain sparsely covered with small trees. The sun was declining rapidly, as the dark green veins of foliage in the otherwise yellow surface of withered grass marked out distinctly the course of small rivulets. The hunters on, sometimes over blackened ashes, where the fire had swept over the ground, and where through withered grass, that had been saved from destruction through the intervention of some ravine. At length we arrived at an excellent halting place, by a beautiful but small stream of water, shaded by a few trees, and close to which, on a dead-reckoning, seventeen miles from our last camp. It had been pleasant traveling, as the weather was cool and bracing, therefore I was useless to expect the camels for some hours, as we occasionally spread the cloth on the ground, and lay down to sleep, with the stocks of the rifles for pillows, as we had frequently done on former occasions.

On the following morning I mounted my horse Tetel, and, with Taber Noor and two of my Tokroonis, Hadj Ali, and Hassan, I rode toward a pyramidical hill about three miles distant, which I intended to ascend for the purpose of obtain a panoramic view of the country. This hill was about three hundred feet high, and, as the Red Sea mountains, a portion of which are about two miles around, I should obtain a clear view of all living animals that might be in the neighborhood. Upon arrival at the base of the hill I dismounted, and led my horse up the steep inclination of the broken basalt that led toward the summit. From the top of the peak I had a superb view extent, and immediately beneath me, in various positions, giraffes, buffalooe, tétel, and koodoos.

I had been observing the country for some time from my high station, when I suddenly perceived two rhinoceros emerge from a ravine. They walked slowly through a patch of high grass, and skirted the base of the hill upon which we were standing. Presently they winded something, and they trotted back and stood revealed in the patch of grass. Although I had a good view of them from my present position, I knew that I should not be able to get a shot at their covert, if on the same level; I therefore determined to send to the tem for my other horses, and to descend into the plain, if I could not shoot them from the hill. I called to Hassan (Taber Noor was on foot; accordingly, I sent him off, desiring him to lead Tetel down the peak, and to secure him to a tree at the foot of the hill, as I was afraid the rhinoceros might observe the horse upon the sky line. This he did, and we saw him tie the horse by the bridle to the branch of a tree below us, while he ran quickly toward the camp. In the mean time I watched the rhinoceros: both animals laid down in the yellow grass, resembling masses of stone. They had not been long in this position before we noticed them wandering from the grass directly to windward, toward the sleeping rhinoceros. In an instant they were awakened, and, snorting and starting up, they looked in all directions, but could not see them, as they were concealed by the high grass. Having been thus disturbed, the rhinoceros moved their quarters, and walked slowly forward, occasionally halting and listening. One was about a hundred yards in advance of the other. They were taking a direction at right angles to that which would lead them directly upon the spot where Tetel was tied to the tree.

I observed that Taber Noor, as I feared they would kill the horse. "Oh no," he replied, "they will lie down and sleep beneath the first tree they see, not seeking for shade as you in like fire." However, they still continued their circuitous route, and, having gone some long gravel, the leading rhinoceros halted, and I felt sure that he had a clear view of the horse, that was now about five hundred yards distant, tied to the tree. A ridge descended from the hill, parallel with the course the animals were taking, and, as this ridge was in the stony slope permitted, keeping my eye fixed upon the leading rhinoceros, I ran with the greatest speed in a direction directly toward the horse. I now felt convinced that he intended to attack it. Tetel did not observe the rhinoceros, but was quietly standing beneath the tree. I was as fast as I was able, and reached the bottom of the hill just as the wild brute was within fifty yards of the horse, which now for the first time saw the approaching danger; the rhinoceros had approached from directly to leeward, so it could have no scent of the horse.

I was about two hundred yards distant, and for the moment I was afraid of shooting the horse, but I fired from the hip. At the report of the bullet, missing the rhinoceros, dashed the bullet close to his face, as it struck the ground exactly before his nose, when he appeared to be just into the unfortunate Tetel. The horse in the same instant broke his bridle-rein, broke the tie, it dashed away in the direction of the camp; while the rhinoceros, with a loud snort, fell upon his face, my ball blinded by the sand and splinters of rock, threw up his head, turned round, and trotted back toward the tree by which he had arrived. He passed me at about a hundred yards distance, as I had run forward to a bush, by which he stopped and fired a second shot, which for the cause of his discomfiture. Crack! went a bullet against the rock. As I fled my remaining barrel at his shoulder; he cocked his tail, and, following in the direction of the shot; and for a few yards he charged toward the shot. That he suddenly turned in his course, and ran round several times in a small circle, he then halted, and looking in the direction of the shot, and looking in the direction of the shot, and looking in the direction of the shot

GEORGE MARCY'S DISAPPEARANCE.

No one knew what had become of him—of brilliant, young, vivacious, gifted, heedless, lovable George Edgar Marcy. He had dropped wholly out of London and literature and lovemaking, and all his airy projects and his occasionally high aspirations, and his dashing criticisms and magazine articles and poems, sessions and smoke—he had left every thing behind him and disappeared. We all said that he might have better spared a better man—some few of us were sincerely sorry for his disappearance—there were some who, as every body afterward learned, felt for more deeply still. His disappearance occurred in this way: George Marcy was a brilliant young litterateur; member of a family which had quite a name in literature, and was himself rapidly fast into a kind of reputation. Any thing very great he would never be—you had only to look at his face and head to see that; but he certainly had a rare gift at vivid sketches, critiques, articles of every kind wherein a certain fresh and light stream of Shakspeatic might lined easily with a fantastic, eccentric, but very genuine humor. A wag once had called him one of the Bohemian school, but that his personal habits were by no means Bohemian; for he rarely preferred a palling club-room to a public house, and a drawing-room well ornamented with pretty and refined women to either. He was a terribly thoughtless, thriftless fellow, and, unless when he liked to work, was decidedly lazy; but he was a gentleman at heart and in manner. He sometimes provoked editors and publishers out of all patience; for when the first installment of copy came, there was no saying when the next would come, or whether it would ever come at all; and often there were editors who had issued a positive order that no line of George's copy should be accepted unless he brought it himself until the whole (he never sent in any article, however short, in one lot) had been fairly got into hand. But at a time had this or that editor vowed that never again would he have any thing to do with George Edgar Marcy, he could not help himself. George Edgar was sure to come in and talk him over with irresistible appeal, your self-introduct for the future, and final outburst of drollery. You could no more continue long to be angry with him than if he were a boy or a child body ended by liking him. He was a very handsome young fellow, of decidedly aristocratic and slender make, but shapely and lithe; and he had curling black hair, and black, vivacious, sparkling eyes. He used to have one of the many girls, and all of them liked him—and, again, one at least felt more than a liking for him.

George had been brought up in Italy, and had a great deal of the Italian about him in the animation and variety of gesture and intonation, as well as the dark hair and eyes. At the time I speak of, he had, indeed, only been some months home from Italy. One of the houses which he now visited most frequently was that of Mr. Bathurst, a man of much taste in art and letters, who had a handsome house in Kensington, and was fond of gathering authors and painters and journalists round him. Mr. Bathurst had a daughter Annie who was both pretty and clever, and had, moreover, a quick, clear brain and highly cultivated tastes. We who frequented the house were all very fond of Annie Bathurst; it was very fond of her; but then, so was my wife too; and, therefore, in my case it did not matter. But I thought—we all thought—George Edgar Marcy was also fond of her, and in quite a different way; and she seemed to like his society very much. This looked highly promising and satisfactory; for George was quite a pet of Mr. Bathurst, and the latter would have welcomed whether his daughter's husband had or had not acquired wealth that the gentleman loved him, and that he was a good fellow—now George Edgar was a good fellow. Even then, when we knew the best of him but superficially, and with all his faults, we could say nothing about him which could stop or discourage the father of my girl who loved him.

One night I met George Edgar at Mr. Bathurst's house. I shall always remember that night. George and Miss Bathurst talked together very much, and really seemed pleased with each other. I saw—as I looked purposeless across the room—that their hands met somehow by chance, and that she blushed and trembled, while he looked embarrassed and agitated. I thought these were highly suspicious symptoms.

I had to leave home to one of the newspaper offices that night, and was to return to Mr. Bathurst's for my wife. In my surprise at finding her to go George Marcy rose also, and said he had to leave early, and that he would walk part of the way with me. His going so soon was a surprise; but I made no remark.

As we walked along together he suddenly said:

"Tell me, old fellow, do you ever have presentiments?"

"Sometimes, of course, I fancy I have. All people fancy such things now and then, I suppose. But I don't believe in the fancies—my own or any body else's."

"Well, so—of course not. It's all folly. Yet, somehow, to-night I have a heavy, unconfortable, ominous sort of feeling pressing on me."

"Not all the evening, but lately. No matter —it's all nonsense, probably. Let it go. Tell me, don't you think Annie Bathurst a charming girl?"

"Indeed I do; and a good girl—and I think, George," I added, quite gravely, "that you will be a very happy man."

He looked at me, not alone grave, but sadly.

"I am not worthy," he said, "of the love of a girl like Annie."

"I dare say not. I doubt if many men are worthy of the love of the women who marry them; but I don't believe you are any worse than the rest, George; and I am sure Annie thinks you are a great deal better."

He only shook his head. Suddenly his ear was caught by the talk of two Italian organ-grinders who were lying on the pavement of Piccadilly enjoying the delicious summer air of the evening, and were chatting on some subject.

"Stop," said George; "I really must have a talk with those fellows. I delight in these Italiaps. Besides, you may get on with your copy; don't you see? Something fanciful for the Corsaire or Tenaps Fire? Now, then. One of these boys is a Piedmontese, the other a Lombard; I can tell that at once by the accent. Can't you?"

"Not I. I couldn't distinguish between Piedmontese and Lombard."

George plunged at once into animated conversation with the boys; and after a few moments seemed quite absorbed in talk with the young Lombard. Now my knowledge of Italian is like the knowledge of French with the average guardsman in "Pendennis" describes to Blanche Amory. I understand it of course, you know—and all that—but not well. I have all the colloquial quick' as natives of Italy and some other persons are in the habit of using. I can only follow the conversation, and got tired and pulled George away.

"All, I asked, "have you contrived to extract any copy?"

"No, not a line. The Lombard fellow comes from a village I used to know very well at one time; and I was asking him a few questions about it—and about a girl I used to know, and all." Then he changed the conversation, and began roundly talking on the topic of the street subject until we reached the point at which our roads divided.

"Good-night, old fellow," George said, in a low and rather sad tone. "And, I say, I think of soon leaving town; in fact, I have to leave town very soon—very soon indeed—just for a while."

"Where are you darting off to now?"

"Well, it's a long story, and not all a pleasant one—and, in short, don't ask me. Perhaps I may come back soon—perhaps in a long, long time."

"My dear fellow, what are you talking about —what do you mean?"

"No matter. At least don't ask me—good-night, and good-by."

He seized my hand, grasped it warmly, and then sprang across the street and soon disappeared.

"George is in some scrape," I thought at once. What it could be I was, of course, unable. The most reasonable conjecture seemed to be that he was in debt, and feared he might have to make an excursion out of town to avoid his creditors. I was sorry for this too, because I had myself entered into a small literary speculation sum from a publisher, the profits of two or three little pamphlets which we meditated, and wonderful run; and this money, which he could hardly have squandered since yesterday, would surely have stood over the emergency, and kept wolf-dun from the door.

I resolved to call at his lodgings next morning and try to get into his full confidence.

I called at ten, and found that he had left his lodgings four days before—not to be heard of since by bed, but had spent the night in packing up his books and papers in a large trunk, which he left in the care of his landlady, and his clothes in a portmanteau which he took with him. He told the landlady that his affairs took him to Ireland, but that he might possibly be a much longer time away. Where he was going to, he did not say to the landlady, nor, indeed, did he know himself at home her best to learn.

There was nothing more to be said. We must wait for him to come back. A week after I met Mr. Bathurst, who was surprised at George's not having come down to town the night I last saw the fugitive at his house. A month, two, and still George Edgar Marcy did not return. I called on George's father, with whom his son was on cold, unfriendly terms, because of the elder Marcy having married again very soon after the death of George's mother—a fact which poor George not amiss rarely resented.

Marcy the elder could only tell me that his son had written to him from Ireland, to say that he was about leaving town: that he might possibly be away for a long time, and that he would take it as a favor if no letters or inquiry were made after him.

"And I can assure you," Mr. Marcy concluded, "that I have not made, and don't mean to make, any inquiry whatever. I have no doubt George is all right; but I have no knowledge whether a close inquiry after him would end in any thing creditable for the family to hear."

Cherchez la femme was evidently Mr. Marcy's mode of solving the mystery, and it was after a very short time of private persons.

I had often thought of poor George's casual talk with the Italian organ-boy, and wondered whether that could possibly have had any thing to do with his disappearance. I made many efforts to find the boy again. I never saw an organ-boy without asking him whether he was a Lombard, and whether it was he who had talked with my poor friend, for I was by no means clear about the features of the lad we met in Piccadilly. But my efforts were unsuccessful, and I did not think it well to say any thing about the matter to Mr. Bathurst.

Your Annie began to look thin and pale and sad. Her father made little secret to his intimate friends that his daughter was grieving after George Marcy, and that she could not be brought to believe in any explanation of his disappearance which could make him out unworthy. But her health was giving way; and in the winter her father took her to Nice, and thence to Rome.

Spring and summer came and passed; and autumn sent us all on our holiday tours. George Marcy had been more than a year gone. My wife and I were traveling through a few days in Switzerland, and thence crossed the Alps, meaning to wander for a little while in Lombardy, and pay a short visit to the Bathurts, who were now in Milan.

We were journeying one day over mountains and through valleys in a wretched carriage, which grew so tired that, although it was yet far from sunset, we made up our minds to rest in a little hamlet we saw on a hill-side not far off, and which looked quiet, smiling, and picturesque. But as the driver was about to turn into the village along the road, stopped our driver and talked to him very eagerly; and then, addressing us, told us, in French, that there was a bad fever prevailing now in the village, that many persons were stricken down by it, and that we had better not enter the place. This was very kind of him, and we thanked him; but we really could not go on at once—and I have all the obstinacy of ignorance in not believing that there is any real danger where the people are about and people tell us. So, my wife being equally skeptical, and we both knowing something of Italian exaggeration, we insisted on at least passing through the village and making a short stay there to rest. The driver had his fears and objections; but they resolved themselves into a question of additional pay, and were removed.

We entered the village and drove up to the little tavern, or wine-house, round which the general business of the place seemed to be done. An external sign of any thing very terrible going on; the village looked clean and thriving; there were hardly any beggars to be seen; and all the shops, such as they were, were open. But the landlord of the tavern told us that there were several bad cases of fever—some victims had died yesterday, some were dying to-day.

"Here comes a fever youth, Signor," said the landlord, in a low tone, "whom the fever is likely to rob of his—Hush! Well, Giorgio, how is now?"

This was addressed to a small, slight young man in the garb of one of the country laborers who just then entered. I could not see his face, but his whole attitude and bearing denoted utter dejection. He began to talk with the landlord in a low tone; and he got some wine in a little stone bottle and paid for it, and then turned to leave the shop. As he turned, my wife uttered a half-suppressed scream and caught me by the arm—and before I could move, looking this man full, and dressed like any ordinary peasant, stood poor George Edgar Marcy!

He came on to us and took one hand of each in his, and for a second or two said not a word. His first words were to my wife:

"Are you afraid of fever?"

"Not in the least," we both replied.

Then come with me."

We followed him without a word down the village street and saw him reached a poor little cottage with a patch of vines and some mulberry-trees near it. He beckoned to us to enter, and we followed him into a small, miserably appointed room. There was a bed in it, on which by a fresh-kindled wood-fire lay a girl who evidently been handsome in her days of health, but now was prostrate in what seemed the last stage of consumption. George said:

"My wife!" said George. "My poor dying wife!"

We did not leave the village that day, nor for several days after. We did not leave it until the poor dying girl's spirit had been laid to rest in the village grave-yard.

Gradually we learned from George the whole of his strange story. While living in Italy formerly he had come to spend some time in this town into the village, and he fell in love with the pretty girl who now lay dead. She was only a poor little ignorant peasant girl, but she had a native grace, delicacy, and beauty which naturally charmed an impulsive, eager, poetic boy. The girl was living with her father. George and she exchanged some foolish vows of love and constancy, and his father summoned him home; and in London among the image of his poor little Lombard love was soon in a fair way to be wholly effaced. But it was only to come to know Annie Bathurst—to know that he loved her, to believe that she loved him—it was only then that he began in earnest to repent his folly, and his unexpressed engagement. The thought that he had pressed cruelly on him. He left home when he and I walked home together decided his fate. The Lombard organ-boy with whom we talked carried away the image of his poor little Lombard love was soon in a fair way to be wholly effaced. But it was only to come to know Annie Bathurst—to know that he loved her, to believe that she loved him—it was only then that he began in earnest to repent his folly, and his unexpressed engagement. The thought that he had pressed cruelly on him. He left home when he and I walked home together decided his fate. The Lombard organ-boy with whom we talked carried away the village in which his peasant love was living: and from the boy he heard that her father had been some time dead, and that she was living a lonely, poor, and miserable life. Then George made up his mind. He had plenty of money by him, and he would redeem his pledge at the cost of all the happiness, the purpose, the prospects of his life. He went, and, in his impulsive, heedless, thoughtless young fellow, whom we all regarded as little better than a scape-grace, and knowing that to marry the girl was to pronounce upon himself a sentence of banishment from all he cared for on earth. He married her, brought her the little money he had, and settled down to live the life of a Lombard peasant. He would not write to Annie Bathurst—he said to himself that he had no right to address her, no right to say one word to make matters worse for pity or induce her to regard him with indulgence or with any memory of love.

So he lived a life which he did not describe in me in deliberate words, but which I could well picture to myself—a life of dull, monotonous labor, with an ignorant, mindless, good-natured, bright-eyed peasant girl. They had one baby, which only lived a few hours. Then came the fever in the village, and poor George's soft and manly heart was torn with genuine grief when he stood by the death-bed of the poor creature who was his wife—who had been his love.

But his exile now had no further motive or excuse. We brought him to London, and found in telling him whom he was likely to meet there. And I believe poor George will be happy yet, and that Annie Bathurst will think some day worse of him for his boyish folly and his manly resolve to bear its consequences.

BEETHOVEN.

APROPOS to the great musical festival which opened in this city on Monday, the 13th of June, we give on our first page this week the portrait of the illustrious Composer in honor of whose memory the festival was held. BEETHOVEN ranks among the first of musical composers. Shut off from social intercourse by the infirmity of deafness, he sought refuge in his musical depression in constant activity. In the catalogue of his works there is scarcely a branch of music to which he has not wrought. Even the full orchestra he composed nine symphonies, eleven overtures, the Fidelio, the Ballet of Music, the Victoria,' and a number of smaller pieces. His contributions to chamber music were very numerous. There are thirty-two grand sonatas for the piano-forte solo, and more than one hundred minor compositions. The same number accompanied sonatas, and a number of songs, belong to his contributions to sacred music: and an opera, and a vast variety of songs, form the list in the catalogue of his works.

His earliest compositions were pervaded by a pensiveness and longing, which became still more marked as he advanced in years, and was compelled to withdraw more and more within himself. The profound social and political agitation of the age in which he lived, the lofty aspirations, the sanguine hopes, the triumphs, as well as the griefs, the disappointment, and the despair of humanity, all found a more living expression in his works than in those of any other composer.

Our portrait of BEETHOVEN is taken from an admirable steel engraving kindly furnished us by MR. THEODORE STOEPEL, 859 Broadway.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A MISER few paying particular attention to a lion was asked what he was trying to it. He replied, "I was saying, 'Absurd thou personifiest me to be a Christian.'"

AN AGRICULTURAL ANGLE—A wheat corner.

"Were you in the fight?" said an officer to an elderly person on a railroad car lately. "Fight! I had a little taste of it, sah." "Stood your ground, did you?" "No, sah; I ran." "Ran! I am surprised." "Yes, sah; would rub mah nose sooner if I had known it was gunpowder." "Why, I thought it was gunpowder." "Did you?" "Did you by my face—certainly." "Confederate." "Well, but have you no regard for your reputation?" "Reputation? Reputation by the side ob life." "Do you consider your life worth more than your reputation?" "It's worth more to me, sah."

If you ever find a stiff-jaw Quaker, soaked up to him; you will find him a close friend.

Vena and Minerd had a slight misunderstanding one day, and Vena, fired with indignation against her big brother, kicked the cat. Johnny, who was Vena's favorite beauty, ran to her perplexedly, and said, "Vena, that cat ain't all Minerd's: it's part mine." Vena, with a look which a sort of settled-at-fied air, "I kicked Minerd's part."

A BAND OF HOPE—The Wedding Ring.

A little boy, running, stubbed his toe and fell on the pavement. He picked himself up, and, feeling hurt, said to a bystander: "you won't feel the pain to-morrow." Then, he answered the little boy, "I shall very do to-morrow."

The King was sick in a boarding-house, and made his mind up for some chicken broth. The order went down into the kitchen, and the broth was duly made, fat, and relight. The sick man was subsequently regaled his chicken broth, and was heard to exclaim, "I've just let a chicken wade through it." "If they did," said the landlady, "I had an affair." He recovered.

PERSONS FOR LAWYERS—Sort.

"You don't do work enough to earn your salary," said the head of a department in the New York Custom-house to a clerk. "Why, sir," he exclaimed the young man, "I worked to get here; surely you don't expect me to walk up Broadway?"

A gentleman sent a bid with a letter to the post-office, and money to pay the postage. The letter was returned to him with the bill. "Guess I've done the thing nicely," he exclaimed, and more than once. "I've got a post-office through a bole, and so I watched my chance, got out and put in the letter."

HAIR-VESTICES—Pocket-books.

GOOD ADVICE.—Ask no woman her age. Never joke with a widow. Never contradict a man that stutters. Look civil to all the barbers and waiters. Never bet, of course, for an evening party. Always sit next the earner, if you can, at dinner. Keep your own secrets. Tell no human being you dye your whiskers. Wind up your clocks every Saturday night, and, every day, endeavor minutely whether you are "fast" or "slow." Make friends in the middle state, and keep them, for there's no knowing how soon you may be in need of them. Write short letters and never sign your name to the man who keeps up a large correspondence is a mean fool, and he knows not to the post.

An Indiana husband advertised his wife as "leaving his bed and board," and then applied to her for a loan of a dollar and a half to pay for the advertisement.

A young gentleman was recently asked to take something. He said he was not dry, but he would take the sixpence, which he accordingly pocketed, and walked off.

An exchange which wishes to avoid slang, delicately advises its bellicrent neighbor to "imitate the example of the fowls in time of a draught."

"I have always had and always shall have an earnest and true desire to contribute as far as in me lies to the common stock of healthful cheerfulness and enjoyment. I believe that Virtue shows quite as well in rags and patches as she does in purple and fine linen. I believe that she, and every beautiful object in external nature, claims some sympathy in the breast of the poorest man who breaks his scanty loaf of daily bread."

RECEPTION OF INDIANS AT THE WHITE HOUSE.—DRAWN BY C. S. REINHART.—[SEE PAGE 412.]

ENTRE NOUS.

As we two slowly walked that night,
Silence fell on us—as of fear!
I was afraid to face the light
Lest you should see that I loved you, dear.

You drew my arm against your heart,
So close I could feel it beating near;
You were brave enough for a lover's part—
You were so sure that I loved you, dear.

Then you murmured a word or two,
And tenderly raised your interdict ear;
For you thought that all that you had to do
Was to hear me say that I loved you, dear.

But, though my lips were so close to mine
That you touched my cheek with your cheerful sigh,
I wouldn't my lips to your ravage resign
And yet—I loved you—I loved you, dear.

And all at once you were cold and pale,
Because you thought that I did not care
To risk a total ruin by veil—
But that was because I loved you, dear.

And so you thought 'twas a drop of rain
That splashed your hand? But 'twas a tear!
For then you said you'd never again
Ask me to say that I loved you, dear.

Well! I will tell—if you'll listen now:
I thought of the words you said last year;
How we girls weren't coy enough, and how
There were half a dozen that loved you, dear.

And I was afraid that you held me light,
And as high as my shoulder said, "Brown Bess!"
He's just in a wooing mood to-night."
So I—couldn't say that I loved you, dear.

Not though I thought you the Man of men,
Chiefest of heroes, brave and rare;
Not though I saw with love again
Any man as I loved you, dear.

I have suffered, and so have you;
And to-night, if you were but standing here,
I'll make you an answer straight and true,
If you'd ask again if I loved you, dear.

SIXTEENTH SCENE.—SALT PATCH.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-EIGHTH.

THE PLACE.

Early in the present century it was generally reported among the neighbors of one Reuben Limbrick that he was in a fair way to make a comfortable little fortune by dealing in Salt.

His place of abode was in Staffordshire, on a morsel of inclosed land of his own—appropriately called Salt Patch. Without being absolutely a miser, he lived in the humblest manner; was very little employed; skillfully increased his money; and persisted in remaining a single man.

Toward eighteen hundred and forty the first felt the approach of the chronic malady which ultimately terminated his life. After trying what the medical men of his own locality could do for him, with very poor success, he met by accident with a doctor living in the western suburbs of London, who thoroughly understood his complaint. After some journeying backward and forward to consult this gentleman, he decided on retiring from business, and on taking up his abode within a easy distance of the medical man.

Finding a piece of freehold land to be sold in the neighborhood of Fulham, he bought it, and had a cottage-residence built on it, according to directions. He surrounded the whole—being a man singularly jealous of any intrusion on his retirement, or of any chance observation of his ways and habits—with a high wall, which cost a large sum of money, and which was rightly considered a dismal and hideous object by the neighbors. When the new residence was completed, he called it after the name of the place in Staffordshire where he had made his money, and where he had lived during the beginning and middle of his life. His relatives, failing to understand that a question of interest was involved in his proceeding, appealed to hard facts, and reminded him that there were no salt mines in the neighborhood. Reuben Limbrick merely said, "So much the worse for the neighborhood"—and persisted in calling his property, "Salt Patch."

The cottage was so small that it looked quite lost in the large garden all round it. There was a ground floor and a floor above it—and that was all.

On either side of the passage, on the lower floor, were two rooms. At the right-hand side, on entering by the front-door, there was a kitchen, with its appurtenances attached. At the left-hand lay the kitchen looked into the garden. In Reuben Limbrick's time it was called the study, and contained a small collection of books and a large store of fishing-tackle. On the left-hand side of the passage there was a little apartment situated at the back of the house, and communicating with a dining-room in the front. On the upper floor there were five bedrooms—two on one side of the passage, corresponding in size with the dining-room and the drawing-room below, but not opening into each other; three on the other side of the passage, consisting of one larger room in front, and of two small rooms at the back. All these were solidly and completely furnished. Paper had not been placed, and workmanship had not been studied. It was all substantial—and, up stair- and down stairs, it was all ugly.

The situation of Salt Patch was lonely. The lanes of the market-gardeners separated it from other houses. Jealously surrounded by its own high walls, the cottage suggested, even to the most unimaginative persons, the idea of an asylum or a prison. Reuben Limbrick's relatives, on a certain occasion, attempted to stay with him, found the place prey on their spirits, and rejected when the time came for going home. Others, who never pressed to stay against their will, Reuben Limbrick was not to beginbee ve in such he man. He set very little value on human sympathy, in his attacks of illness; and he bore extraordinary testimony, in his intervals of ease, to "That absent thing but fishing," he used to say. "I find my dog very good company. And I am quite happy for days as I am free from pain."

On his death-bed, he divided his money justly enough among his relations. The only part of his Will which exposed itself to unfavorable criticism, was a clause conferring a legacy on one of his sisters (then a widow) who had estranged herself from the family by a clandestine marriage. The family agreed in considering this unhappy person as undeserving of notice or benefit. Her name was Hester Dethridge. It proved to be a great aggravation of Hester's offenses, in the eyes of Hester's relations, when it was discovered that she possessed a life-interest in Salt Patch, and an income of two hundred a year.

Not visited by the surviving members of her family, living, literally, by herself in the world, Hester decided, on the receipt of her considerable income, on letting lodgings. The explanation of this strange conduct which she had written on her slate, in reply to an inquiry from a friend, was the true one. "I have not got a friend in the world: I dare not be alone." In those circumstances, and with that melancholy motive, she put the house into an agent's hands. The first person in want of lodgings who applied, sent on to see the place was Perry the trainer; and Hester's first tenant was Geoffrey Delamayn.

The rooms which the landlady reserved for herself were the kitchen, the room next to it, which had once been her brother's study, and which the two small back bedrooms up stairs—one for herself, the other for the servant-girl whom she employed to help her. The whole of the rest of the cottage was to let. It was more than the trainer wanted; but Hester Dethridge refused to dispose of her lodgings—either as to the rooms occupied, or as to the period for which they were to be taken—other than her own terms. Perry had no alternative but to lose the advantage of the garden as a private training-ground, or to submit.

Being only two in number, the lodgers had time between them to choose from. Geoffrey established himself in the back-room, over the drawing-room. Perry chose the front-room, over the study on the other side of the cottage, next to the two smaller apartments occupied by Hester and her maid. Each of the arrangements, the front bedroom, on the opposite side of the passage—next to the room in which Geoffrey made love left to the trainer; and the dining-room, as a needless luxury, to take care of itself.

The Foot-Race was over, Perry's business on the cottage was at an end. His empty bedroom and sitting-room were let to the first person for which the lodgings had been taken was then still unexpired. On the day after the race Geoffrey had the house to himself—with the exception, or remaining in the lodgings by himself, with two small bedrooms and two halls, and with a drawing-room for the reception of his visitors—who called with pipes in their mouths, and whose idea of hospitality was a pot of beer and a clay pipe.

To use his own phrase, he was "out of sorts." A dogged reluctance to face anything in any kind possessed him. He decided on staying at Salt Patch until his marriages to Mrs. Glenarm (which he then looked upon as a certainty) brought him to alter his habits completely, once for all. From Fulham he had gone, the next day, to attend the inquiry in Portland Place. And to Fulham he returned, when he brought the wife he had been forced to marry to her new home.

Such was the position of the tenant, and such were the arrangements of the cottage, on the day—by the memorable evening when Anne Silvester entered it as Geoffrey's wife.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-NINTH.

THE NIGHT.

On leaving Lady Lundie's house, Geoffrey Delamayn left the two women together. Anne opened the door, and signed to Anne to enter the vehicle. She obeyed him mechanically. He told the coachman the new address to be, and told the man to drive to Fulham.

The cab started on its journey: husband and wife preserving absolute silence. Anne laid her head back wearily, and closed her eyes. Her husband looked down at her, and saw that she had sustained her from the beginning to the end of the marriage-ceremony. She was sustained now. She felt nothing, knew nothing, feared nothing. Half in faintness, half in slumber, she had lost all sense of her own terrible position, during the first five minutes of the journey to Fulham had come to an end.

Sitting opposite to her, savagely self-concentrated in his own thoughts, Geoffrey roused himself on a sudden. An idea had sprung to life in his sluggish brain. He put his head out of the window, and looked over the roofs of the cab to turn back, and go to an hotel near the Great Northern Railway.

Looking back to seat, he looked furtively at Anne. She neither moved nor opened her eyes—she was, to all appearance, unconscious of what had happened. He observed her attentively. Was she really ill? Was the time coming when he would be freed from her? He pondered over that question—watching her closely. Little by little the vile hope in him slowly died away, and a vile suspicion took its place. What, if this appearance of illness was a pretense? What, if she was waiting to throw him off its guard, and escape from him at the first opportunity? He put his head out of the window again, and gave another order to the driver. The cab diverged from the direct route, and stopped at a public house in Holborn, kept (under an assumed name) by Perry the trainer.

Geoffrey wrote a line in pencil on his card, and sent it into the house by the driver. After waiting some minutes, Perry appeared and touched his hat. Geoffrey spoke to him, out of the window, in an under-tone. The hat took his place on the box by the driver. The cab turned back, and took the road to the hotel near the Great Northern Railway.

Arrived at the place, Geoffrey posted the list close at the door of the cab, and pointed to Anne, still reclining with her eyes closed. He was now, at last, too weary to lift her head, too fitful to notice any thing that happened. If she attempts to get out, stop her, and send for me." With those parting directions he entered the hotel, and asked for Mr. Mirr.

Mr. Mov was in the house; he had just returned from Scotland Place. He rose, and bowed coldly, when Geoffrey was shown into his sitting-room.

"What is your business with me?" he asked.

"I've had a notion come into my head," said Geoffrey, "And I want to speak to you about it directly."

"I must request you to consult some one else. Consider me as busy, for the present, as having withdrawn all further connection with your affairs."

Geoffrey looked at him in stolid surprise.

"Do you mean to say you're going to leave me in the lurch?" he asked.

"I mean to say that I will take no fresh step in any business of yours," answered Mr. Moy, firmly. "As to the future, I have ceased to be your legal adviser. Prior to the past, I shall carefully complete the formal duties toward you which remain to be done. Your hearing at Bishopsrigg are coming here by appointment, at six this evening, to receive the money due to them before they go back. I shall return to Scotland myself by the night mail. The persons referred to, in the matter of the promise of marriage, Sir Patrick, are all in Scotland. I will take their evidence as to the handwriting, and as to the question of residence in the North —and I will send it to you in written form. That done, I shall have done all. I decline to advise you in any way which may stop you proceed to take."

After reflecting for a moment, Geoffrey put a last question.

"You said Bishopsrigg and the woman would be here at this present hour?"

"Yes."

"Where are they to be found before that?"

Mr. Moy wrote a few words on a slip of paper, and handed it to Geoffrey. "At their lodgings," he said. "Here is the address."

Geoffrey took the address, and left the room. Lawyer and client parted without a word on either side.

Returning to the cab, Geoffrey found the list carefully watched as before.

"Has any thing happened?"

"The lady hasn't moved, Sir, since you left her."

"Is Perry at the public house?"

"Not at this present, Sir."

"I want a lawyer. Do you know who Perry's lawyer is?"

"Yes, Sir."

"And where he is to be found?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Get up on the box, and tell the man where to drive to."

The cab went on again along the Euston Road, and stopped at a house in a side-street, with a professional brass plate on the door. The lad got down, and came to the window.

"Here it is, Sir.

"Knock at the door, and see if he is at home."

He proved to be at home. Geoffrey entered the house, leaving his emissary once more on the watch. The lad noticed that the lady moved this time. Geoffrey looked at her as she lay, and opened her eyes for a moment wearily, and looked out through the window—sighed, and sunk again in the corner of the cab.

After an absence of more than half an hour Geoffrey returned to the cab. His interview with Perry's lawyer appeared to have relieved his mind of something that had oppressed it. He gave his directions to the driver to go to Fulham—opened the door to get into the cab—then, as it seemed, suddenly recollected the lad, calling the lad down from the box, ordered him to get inside, and took his place by the driver.

The lad looked over his shoulder at Anne through the front window. "Well off to sleep," he said to himself. "It's the way to be even with her. And it's the way to be free."

They arrived at the cottage. Possibly, repose had restored Anne's strength. Possibly, the sight of the place had roused the instinct of self-preservation in her at last. To Geoffrey's surprise, she left the cab without assistance. When he opened the wooden gate, with his own key, she recoiled from it, and looked at him for the first time.

He pointed to the entrance.

"Go in," he said.

"On what terms?" she asked, without striving a step.

Geoffrey dismissed the cab; and sent the lad in, to wait for further orders. These things done, he answered her loudly and brutally the moment they were alone:

"On any terms I please.

"Nothing will induce me," she said, firmly, "to live with you as your wife. You may kill me—but you will not bend me to that."

He advanced a step—opened his lips—suddenly checked himself. He waited a while, turning something over in his mind. When he spoke again, it was with marked deliberation and constraint—with the air of a man who was repeating words put into his lips, or words prepared beforehand.

"I have something to tell you in the presence of witnesses," he said. "I don't ask you, or wish you, to see me in the cottage with me."

She started at the change in him. His sudden compliance, and his unlooked-for use in the choice of words, tried her courage far more severely than it had been tried by his violence of the moment before.

He waited her decision, still pointing through the gate. She trembled a little—touched the gate—and passed it. He had, waiting in the front garden, followed her.

He threw open the drawing-room door, on the left-hand side of the passage. She entered the room. The servant-girl appeared. He said to her, "Fetch Mrs. Dethridge; and come back with her yourself." Then he went into the room; shut the door by his own hand; threw himself into it; and the door being left wide open.

Hester Dethridge came out from the kitchen with the girl behind her. At the sight of Anne, a faint and momentary change passed over the stony stillness of her face. A dull light glimmered in her eyes. She slowly nodded her head. A dumb sound, vaguely expressive of something like exultation or relief, escaped her lips.

Geoffrey spoke—once more, with marked deliberation and constraint—without looking up. The air of repeating something which had been prepared beforehand. He pointed to Anne.

"This woman is my wife," he said. "In the presence of you three, as witnesses, I tell her that I don't forgive her. I have brought her down to this miserable place in which I can insist her to be—to wait the issue of proceedings, undertaken in defense of my own honor and good name. While she stays here, she will live separate from me, in a room of her own. If it is necessary for the communication with her, I shall see her in the presence of a third person. Do you all understand me?"

Hester Dethridge bowed her head. The other two answered, "Yes"—and turned to go out. Geoffrey made a sign from Geoffrey, observed and the lad waited in the room to hear what she had to say.

"I know nothing in my conduct," she said, addressing herself to Geoffrey, "which justifies you in either of the base people that you've given me. Those words applied by you to me are an insult. I am equally ignorant of what you mean when you speak of defending your friend's name. All I understand is, that we are separate persons in this house, and that I am to be a prisoner of my own. I am grateful, whatever your motives may be, for the arrangement that you have proposed. Your conduct of these two women to show me my room."

Geoffrey turned to Hester Dethridge.

"Take her up stairs," he said; "and let her pick which room she pleases. Give her what she wants to eat and drink. Bring down the pieces of the place where her luggage is. The lad here will go back by railway, and fetch it. That's all. Be off."

Hester went out. Anne followed her up the stairs. In the passage on the upper floor she stopped. The dull light flickered again on the mourner in her eyes. She wrote on her slate, and held it to Anne, with these words on it: "I knew you would come back. It's not the first time I've known you." Silence made no reply. She went on writing, with something faintly like a smile on her thin, colorless lips. "I knew you would be glad husband. Glad is as bad a one as ever stood in shoes. He'll try you." Anne made no reply to that, either. "Shall you see how tired I am?" she said, gently. Hester Dethridge dropped the slate—looked with a momentary expression of compassion on Anne's face—nodded her head, as much as to say, "I see for myself"—and led the way into one of the empty rooms.

It was the front bedroom, over the drawing-room. The large, square ground window let in a scrupulously clean, and solidly and tastefully furnished. The bedstead was of iron, with the hideous carpet on the floor, were both of the best quality. The great heavy mahogany bedstead, with its curtains hanging from the centre of the ceiling, and with its elaborately carved head and foot on the same model, offered to the view an unexpected spectacle of French design overwhelmed by English execution. The most noticeable thing in the room was the extraordinary attention which had been given to the defense of the door. Besides the usual lock and key, it possessed two solid bolts, fastening inside at the top and the bottom. It had been one among the many eccentric proofs which Reuben Limbrick's character to live in perpetual dread of his breaking into his cottage at night. All the outer doors and all the inner doors and shutters were solidly furnished with iron, and had alarm-bells attached to them on a new principle. Every one of the bedrooms possessed its two bolts on the inner side of the door. And, to crown all, on the roof of the cottage was a little belfry, containing a bell large enough to make itself heard at the Fulham police station. Reuben Limbrick's fancy in the type had communicated with his bedroom. It hung now against the wall, in the passage outside.

Looking round, one by one, at the objects around her, Anne's eyes rested on the partition wall which divided the room from the room next to it. The wall was not broken by a door of communication; it had nothing placed against it but a wash-hand-stand and two chairs.

"Who sleeps in the next room?" said Anne.

Hester Detheridge pointed down to the drawing-room in which they had left Geoffrey. Geoffrey slept in the room.

Anne led the way out again into the passage.

"Show me the second room," she said.

The second room was also in front of the house. More ugliness (of first-rate quality) in the paper and the carpet. Another heavy mahogany bedstead. In this case, a bedstead with a canopy attached to the head of it—supporting its own curtains. Anticipating Anne's inquiries on this occasion, Hester looked toward the next room, at the back of the cottage, and pointed to herself. Anne at once decided on occupying the second room; it was the farthest from Geoffrey.

Hester waited while she wrote the address to which her luggage would be found (at the house of the musical agent), and then, having applied for and received her directions as to the way to travel which she should send up stairs, quitted the room.

Left alone, Anne secured the door, and threw herself on the bed. Still too weary to exert her mind, still physically incapable of realizing the helplessness and the peril of her position, she opened a locket that hung from her neck, kissed the portrait of her mother and the portrait of Blanche placed opposite to each other in it, and sank into a deep and dreamless sleep.

Meanwhile Geoffrey repeated his final orders to the lad, at the cottage gate.

"When you have got the luggage, you are to go to the lawyer. If he can come here at once, you will show him the way. If he can't come, you will bring me a letter from him. Don't mistake in this, and it will be the worst day's work you ever did in your life. Away with you, and don't lose the road."

The lad ran off. Geoffrey waited, looking after him, and turning over in his mind what had been done up to that time.

"All right, so far," he said to himself. "I didn't tell the girl with her face at the wash-hand-stand. Women are queer. Well, I've got a woman to work with, and I've got a man to work with. Now about the woman up stairs? Hester's slate, aided by the girl's tongue, has told me what I want to know. She was to be told. They had taken up to her room tea and an omelet; and they had been obliged to wake her from a sleep. She had eaten the half of the omelet, and had drunk eagerly of the tea. They left her open up again in the tray drawn. She had returned to the bed. She was not asleep—only dull and heavy. Made no remark. Looked about her, but not with any alarm; and we let her be. Such was the report. After listening to it, without making any remark, Geoffrey filled a second pipe, and resumed his walk. The time wore on. It began to feel chilly in the garden. Geoffrey stood swept sullenly over the open lands round the cottage; the stars twinkled, their last appearance was to be seen overhead in the black void of night. More rain coming, Geoffrey went indoors.

An evening newspaper was on the dining-room table. The candles were lit. He sat down, and started to read. No! There was something in the newspaper that he cared about. The time for hearing from the lawyer was drawing nearer and nearer. Reading was out of the question. Sitting still was of no use. He got up, and went out in the front of the cottage—strided to the gate—opened it, and looked right and left down the road.

Not one living creature was visible by the light of the gas-lamp over the gate. The creature came nearer, and proved to be the postman going his last round, with the last delivery for the night. He came up to the gate with a letter in his hand.

"The Honorable Geoffrey Delamayn?"

"All right."

He took the letter from the postman, and went back into the dining-room. Looking at the address by the light of the candles, he recognized the handwriting of Mrs. Glenarm. "To congratulate me on my marriage?" he said to himself, bitterly. He opened the letter.

Mrs. Glenarm's congratulations were expressed in these terms:

"MY ADORED GEOFFREY,—I have heard all. My beloved one! my own! you are sacrificed to the vilest woman that walks the earth, and I have lost you! How is it that I live after hearing it? How is it that I can think, and write, with my brain on fire, and my heart breaking? Oh, my angel, there is a purpose that supports me—pure, beautiful, worthy of us both. I live, Geoffrey—I live to dedicate myself to the adored idea of You. My hero! my first, last, love! I will marry no other man. I will live and die—I vow it solemnly on my bended knees—I will live and die single for You. I am your eternal Wife. My beloved Geoffrey! she can't come between us, there—she can never rob you of my heart's unalienable fidelity, of my soul's unearthly devotion. I am your Spiritual Wife! Oh, the blunders luxury of writing those words! Write back to me, beloved one, and say you feel it too. Vow it, idol of my heart, as I have vowed it. Unalterable fidelity! unearthly devotion! Never, never will I be the wife of any other man! Never, never will I forgive the woman who has come between us! Yours ever and only; yours with the stainless passion that burns on the altar of the heart; yours, yours, yours—G."

This outbreak of hysterical nonsense—in itself simply ridiculous—assumed a serious importance in its effect on Geoffrey. It associated the direct attainment of his own interests with the gratification of his vengeance on Anne. Ten thousand a year self-dedicated to him—and nothing to prevent his putting out his hand and taking it but the woman who had caught him in her trap, the woman up stairs who had delivered herself on him for life!

He put the letter into his pocket. "Wait till I hear from the lawyer," he said to himself. "The easiest way out of it is that way. And it's the last."

He looked impatiently at his watch. As he did so a loud sound of knocking came to his ear at the bell. Was it the lad bringing the luggage? Yes. And, with it, the lawyer's respects? No. Only the lawyer himself.

"I come in!" cried Geoffrey, meeting his visitor at the door.

The lawyer entered the dining-room. The candle-light revealed a man, stout, comfortable, full-lipped, bright-eyed man—with a strain of negro blood in his yellow face, and with a considerable share of the negro's dull manner of walking habitually in the dirtiest professional by-ways of the law.

"I've got a little place of my own in your neighborhood," he said. "And I thought I would look in myself, Mr. Delamayn, on my way home."

"Have you seen the witnesses?"

"I have examined them both, Sir. First, Mrs. Inchbare and Mr. Bishopriggs together. Next, Mrs. Inchbare and Mr. Bishopriggs separately."

"Well?"

"Well, Sir, the result is unfavorable, I am sorry to say."

"What do you mean?"

"Neither the one nor the other of them, Mr. Delamayn, can give the evidence we want. I have made sure of that."

"Made sure of that? You have made an influential mess of it! You don't comprehend the case!"

The malmto lawyer smiled. The rudeness of his client gave him a right to amuse him.

"Don't I?" he said. "Suppose you tell me where I am wrong, Sir? Here it is in outline only. On the fourteenth of August last your wife was at an inn in Scotland. A gentleman named Arnold Brinkworth became ill there. He represented himself to be her husband, and he stated with his own lips that morning, according from those facts, the object you have in view is to sue for a divorce from your wife. In this mind Mr. Arnold Brinkworth is the co-respondent. And you produce in evidence the waiter and the landlady of the inn. Any thing wrong, Sir, so far?"

Nothing wrong. At one cowardly stroke to crush Anne Silvester, and to deliver him at last himself free—there, plainly and truly stated, was the scheme which he had devised, when he had turned back on the road to Fulham to consult Mr. Moy.

"So much for the case," resumed the lawyer. "Now for what I have done on receiving your instructions. I have examined the witnesses, Sir. And I have found them, one and all (with not one) with Mr. Moy. The result of those two proceedings is—Mr. Moy's opinion, that in assuming the character of the lady's husband, Mr. Brinkworth was acting under your directions—which tells direct against you. Opinion secondary: Not the slightest impropriety of conduct, and no approach even to immorality, was detected by either of the witnesses, while the lady and gentleman were together at the inn. Fierce in favor of evidence to prove the contrary then, except that they were together—in two rooms. How are you to assume a guilty purpose, when you have to prove an approach to guilty act? You can no more take such a case as that into court than you can jump over the roof of this cottage."

He looked hard at his client, expecting to receive a violent reply. His client agreeably disappointed him. A very strange impression appeared to have been produced on his reckless and headstrong man. He got up quietly; he spoke with perfect outward composure of face and manner and voice. He said, simply:

"Have you given up the case?"

"As things are at present, Mr. Delamayn, there is no case."

"And no hope of my getting divorced from her?"

"Wait a moment. Have your wife and Mr. Brinkworth left the country since they were together at the Scotch inn?"

"Nowhere."

"As for the future, of course I can't say. As to the past, there is no hope of your getting divorced from her."

"Thank you. Good-night."

"Good-night, Mr. Delamayn."

Fastened to her for life—and the law powerless to cut the knot.

He pondered over that result until he had thoroughly realized it and fixed it in his mind. Then his mood changed. He paused, and then read it through again, attentively, from beginning to end.

Nothing could shake her devotion to him. Nothing would induce her to marry another man. There she was—in her own words—dedicated to him: waiting, with her fortune at her own disposal, to be his wife. There she was in her father, waiting (so far as he knew, in the absence of any tidings from Holchester House) to welcome Mrs. Glenarm as a daughter-in-law, and to give Mrs. Glenarm's husband an income of his own. As fair a prospect, on all sides, as man could desire. And nothing in the way of it but the woman who had caught him in her trap—the woman up stairs who had fastened herself on him for life.

He went out in the garden in the darkness of the night.

There was open communication, on all sides, between the back garden and the front. He walked round and round the cottage—now appearing in a stream of light from a window; now disappearing again in the darkness. The wind blew refreshingly over his bare head. For some moments he went round and round, faster and faster, without a pause. When he stopped at last, it was in front of the cottage.

He took out his watch, and looked up at the dim light in the window of Anne's room.

"How?" he said to himself. "That's the question. How?"

He went indoors again, and rang the bell. The servant girl who answered it started back at the sight of him. His florid color was all gone. His voice was low and hoarse when appearing to see her. The perspiration was standing on his forehead in great heavy drops.

"Are you ill, Sir?" said the girl.

He told her, with an oath, to hold her tongue and bring him the brandy. When she entered the room for the second time, he was standing with his back to her, looking out at the night. He never moved, or spoke, while she laid the table. She heard him muttering as if he was talking to himself.

The same difficulty which had been present to his mind in secret under Anne's window was present to him now.

How? That was the problem to solve. How?

He turned to the brandy, and took counsel of that.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE well recognized cry of "Straw-ber-ries! straw-ber-ries!" was heard in the street long ago in the streets of our city, yet a glimpse any morning into Fulton, Washington, and other busy down-town markets, will show that this luscious fruit is by no means gone. Somebody has said that doubtless God might have made a better berry than the strawberry, but that he never did. We certainly feel exceedingly content with the fruits vouchsafed to us during the season of the palate, which are offered for sale every morning—red, ripe, and fresh. Long ago this fruit in the vegetable world is good in its season, and the raspberries, blueberries, huckleberries, currants, blackberries, cherries, peaches, etc., which follow strawberries, will not fail to be appreciated. Perhaps our reason why we place the extra value on the first delivery is because it comes first, when, weary of preserved and canned fruits, we are ready to welcome Nature's bounteous supply.

"Red Cloud," the Indian Chief, evidently regards fashionable costume as an absurdity. He is reported to have been in Washington considerable of a lounger, when he first saw the ladies of Washington in street costume. Well, it is not strange. Ladies themselves laugh at it, when the fashion plates offer it.

A very pleasant excursion party, consisting of three hundred California school-teachers, accompanied by a number of others, left San Francisco on the 15th of May, and arrived at this city on the 8th of June, having made the trip in twenty-three hours. This is the largest party that ever crossed the Rocky Mountains. The excursionists came through in a special train of cars, under the care of Parker and Pullman, sleeping cars, without accident or delay. They were accompanied by Andrew Jackson, Superintendent of Public Schools of San Francisco, and John Swett, ex-superintendent of Public Instruction of the State of California. From Omaha they came by way of the Burlington and Missouri River and the Pennsylvania Central Railroads. The excursion rates were $150 for the round trip, exclusive of sleeping cars.

An interesting relic was lately exhibited at the Methodist Historical Preachers' Meeting in this city. It was the old parish Bible which for over a century was in the custody of Wesley Chapel, England, and from which Rev. Samuel Wesley and his son, John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, preached so long. The relic was given by Abraham Beaman, Superintendent of Public Schools of San Francisco, and John Swett, ex-superintendent of Public Instruction of the State of California. From Omaha they came by way of the Burlington and Missouri River and the Pennsylvania Central Railroads. The excursion rates were $150 for the round trip, exclusive of sleeping cars.

The M'Farland trial, or rather the incidents that caused it, have been worked up into a four-act drama, accompanied with comic songs, for a San Francisco theatre.

Brigham Young, in a recent discourse in the New Tabernacle in Salt Lake City, remarked that a few years ago it took about sixteen yards of cloth to make a dress for a woman, and she wanted a considerable quantity to drag in the streets. Now, he supposed, they make their dresses out of five yards and a half, and have as much trailing in the mud as ever. Evidently, Brigham Young knows nothing about dress-making.

Do not chew tobacco if there is any chance of your being cast overboard in the wake of a steam-boat. A young man in Cincinnati had his mouth well stored with tobacco, when he was so suddenly and unexpectedly swallowed the end. His life was scarcely saved.

The so-called "Sleeping Beauty of Tennessee" has another less romantic successor in Miss Anne Godsey. Her story, as given by local papers, is briefly as follows: She is about four years old when a fever-sick with what was supposed to be chills and fever; but the ailment developed into more. At the end of two years she fell into a nervous sleep, from which she has not woke since for a longer time than seven minutes at a time, and then usually from seven o'clock at night until about six in the morning, and through the day she sleeps as soundly as hour. Sometimes she spells she speaks pleasantly and intelligently, answering questions correctly, and is then apparently quite happy and contented. One of the strangest points of this case is the apparent absence of any necessity of any thing like respiration. A piece of the finest polished glass held to her mouth for hours does not dim it. Her pulse is perfectly still, and but for a nervous and tremulous motion of the body, which continues about ten days after the death of the dead. She has grown during her affliction from a tiny little girl to a woman of average height, and weighs ninety-six pounds; and although her body and hands show her very poor in flesh, her face is full and smooth, and her features well developed and beautiful. She is about twenty-five years old, and is tenderly watched over by her widowed mother.

A German translation of Mrs. Stowe's "Old Town Folks," in four volumes, has appeared in Berlin.

A spoonful of powdered charcoal dropped into the water in which hyacinths are kept will preserve the flowers fresh for several days.

THE PLAYMATES.—[FROM A PAINTING BY J. HAYLLAR.]

THE PLAYMATES.

MR. HAYLLAR, the painter of this pleasant picture, is an English artist who has made the representation of child life and character a specialty—rarely attempting more ambitious subjects. The picture we have engraved presents a freshness and vivacity of treatment well suited to the theme with which it deals. The subject itself requires no comment. It will remind many readers, no doubt, of WORDSWORTH'S beautiful description of a kitten with falling leaves, which we quote for the benefit of those who do not happen to have a volume of his poems at hand. The poem is an autumn reverie; but the lines we copy apply just as well to this pretty midsummer picture. Watching the falling leaves, the kindly poet thus beautifully mingles imagination and description:

> Eddying round and round, they sink
> Slowly, slowly: one might think,
> From the motions that are made,
> Every little leaf conveyed
> Sylph or Fairy hither tending—
> To this lower world descending—
> Each invisible and mute
> In his wavering parachute.
> But the kitten, how she starts,
> Crouches, stretches, paws, and darts,
> First at one, and then its fellow,
> Just as light and just as yellow;
> There are many now—now one—
> Now they stop, and there are none.
> What intenseness of desire
> In her upward eye of fire!
> With a tiger-leap, half-way
> Now she meets the coming prey,
> Lets it go again, and then
> Has it in her power again.
> Now she works with three or four,
> Like an Indian conjuror;
> Quick as he in feat of art—
> Far beyond in joy of heart.
> Were her antics played in the eye
> Of a thousand standers-by,
> Clapping hands, with shout and stare,
> What would little Tabby care
> For the plaudits of the crowd?
> Over-happy to be proud—
> Over-wealthy in the treasure
> Of her own exceeding pleasure!

The skill of the artist is surely not ill employed upon subjects like those selected by MR. HAYLLAR, which address themselves to the more genial instincts of human nature, and convey a harmless enjoyment to thousands who would take far less interest in works of a more ambitious character.

INDIANS AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

ON the evening of June 6 a grand Indian reception took place at the White House, of which we give an illustration on page 409. The members of the diplomatic corps, the Cabinet, and a large number of other dignitaries, with their ladies, were present; and the Blue, Green, and Red rooms were crowded by the brilliant assemblage. The ladies were attired in magnificent summer reception and levée costumes, and the gentlemen were in full party dress.

The Indian delegation were received in the East Room by Commissioner PARKER. SPOTTED TAIL, with his three braves, were seated at the northeast end of the room, and RED CLOUD, and his party of a dozen men and four squaws, were seated on the east side. SPOTTED TAIL and his braves, says an eye-witness, were dressed in blue blankets, white leggins, white shirts, and with each a single eagle feather adorned the back of the hair. Their faces were painted with the war-paint, and all the head and feather trinkets of the body and legs were used. RED CLOUD was horribly painted—neck, face, and head. He wore a grotesque head piece, made of eagle feathers, and otherwise decked into red flannel. This was trailed down from the head to the very ground, and was not only odd, but beautiful.

and RED CLOUD and the other Indians followed, and shook hands with every lady and gentleman in the room. By the ladies it seemed to be especially enjoyed. They had no fear of RED CLOUD and SPOTTED TAIL, with their gloved hands; and they appeared to enjoy the huge hand-shaking they gave and received from the sons of the forest. They all—young and old, single and married—seemed to forget for the moment the rules and restrictions of polite society, and gave themselves up to the thorough enjoyment of the strange scene. They put in-

of the delicacies of civilized life with evident relish, and ate very freely of cakes and ices. The President and Mrs. GRANT and the other ladies and gentlemen helped the guests to the unwonted viands. Judge HOAR and Secretary ROBESON paid special attention to the squaws—cutting cake, handing them nick-nacks, etc. One of these squaws took from the President a button and a French "kiss;" and, taking her pocket-book from her bosom, placed them in it, and returned her pocket-book to its hiding-place, amidst general laughter from the whites. About was made under very unfavorable circumstances. There was almost a dead calm; and the two vessels lay chafing like thoroughbreds at their enforced inactivity, and, although their helms were down, and their fore-sheets to windward, contriving, nevertheless, to forge ahead. Then the gun was fired; in a moment, as it were, the sails were set, and the Sappho seemed literally to leap away. Presently a heavy fog came on, and for some time hid the rival vessels from sight. At length it lifted, when the Cambria appeared to windward of the Sappho; but, by an error in

THE "SAPPHO" ROUNDING THE "VICTIS," AND SETTING HER BALLOON-CANVAS.

RED DOG, his lieutenant and orator, also had one of the eagle head-dresses, as had several of the other chiefs. All kinds of grotesque shawls, blankets, and robes, with a variety of shirts, leggins, and every conceivable kind of head and trinket adornment, were brought into use by RED CLOUD and his band. The squaws wore short dresses, high bodies or shirts, and their cheeks, nose, and forehead were thickly covered with red paint.

The introduction to the President and the rest of the company present is described as having been very amusing. Commissioner PARKER led, numerable questions, through the interpreters, and curiously examined the costumes, the hair-dressing, the paint on the cheeks, the beads, the tin ornaments of the Indians; who, on their part, were no less curious in regard to the dress and more brilliant ornament. Of the whites. Both ranks were soon broken, and from every part of the room rose laughter and exclamations of wonder and admiration as something strange or ludicrous struck the eye.

A handsome evening entertainment in the state dining-room closed the reception. It was noticed that our barbarian brethren partook

10 o'clock the guests departed, much pleased with the manner of their reception and entertainment. Before returning to the West they will visit New York and other cities.

THE "SAPPHO" AND THE "CAMBRIA."

THIS illustration represents the most exciting moment during the progress of the third race between the Sappho and the Cambria. The start in this race, as our readers may remember, seamanship she lost the advance of position, and the American yacht, as represented in the illustration, rounded the mark-boat first, passing close beneath her stern, within a biscuit-toss. As soon as she felt the wind free she run up a cloud of canvas (she is represented in the act of setting her balloon-jib and her main-topmast stay-sail), and tore away at a wonderful rate. These precious three minutes enabled the Sappho to win the race with ease, and to round the mark-boat in triumph, while the Cambria, full a mile astern, lay becalmed and struggling vainly against the ebb-tide.

UNITED STATES WATCH COMPANY'S FACTORY, MARION, N. J.

UNITED STATES WATCH COMPANY.—GILES, WALES, & CO.

It is with more than ordinary pleasure that we devote ourselves to this sketch of one of the most interesting items that this country can boast, and, as individuals, have ever been privileged to furnish to the country for the locating and perfecting of an establishment that entirely relieves us of the necessity of coming to Europe to possess a time-piece, which, when obtained, is of unusual inaccuracy, or an unusual particular delicacy. This has been done away with, however, and through the efforts of the senior member, F. A. GILES, Esq., the name of the firm and the American manufacture has been placed upon the highest niche, and has received the highest honors at the hands of the best judges of this country, but from the skillful and ingenious of all countries and from all parts of the world. It will be a matter of surprise to many when we inform them that F. A. GILES, Esq., the head and front of this monster institution, is a young man, only 32 years of age, and yet in the cooling mind—the planner, the inventor, the originator, and competent of one of the greatest establishments ever conceived in this our time.

When it is considered that MR. GILES had none of the advantages of wealth or influence to assist him in the furtherance of his schemes, but was obliged to battle with, the brilliant success which has followed his efforts is the more to be admired, and received, and which the world is always ready to bestow on the man who is bold and honest enough to devote his life to the interests and well-being of all who contract or may be brought in contact with him.

MR. GILES spent several years as salesman in the employ of PLANT & BRO., where he projected and founded the present house of GILES, WALES, & CO., embracing W. A. WALES, Esq. (who at that time had charge of the New York office of the Mercury Revolver, and C. D., his younger brother, F. S. GILES, and his brother-in-law, C. H. WALES, Esq. It was in this junction that he conceived the idea of making not only the machinery, and organized the now notoriously celebrated United States Watch Co., on the Marion Building-Co., with a view not only to provide houses for the families of the operatives, but by purchasing and improving a very large tract of land, to reap the benefit of the great increase in the value of real estate caused by building these extensive works thereon.

MR. GILES being left an orphan at the age of eight years, and being the oldest male member of a family of seven children, it became incumbent on him, with his eldest sister, to provide for and to superintend the education of the rest. This he accomplished with success and a brother, he determined on learning the manufacturing of watchwork, with the idea, at some future day, of controlling the destinies of a watch manufactory. After perfecting his mechanical studies and starting business in this city, he made a trip to Europe, and there laid the foundation for the furtherance of his early-laid plans. On his return he commissioned his younger brother, who at that time had no particular knowledge of the business, to carry out the project as he had formed it, to the prosecution of the work branch, until he could return to his place here, at which time he intended to withdraw and instruct him in the finishing and adjusting departments. Machinery, and of which the foundation machinery had no knowledge. One year ago he was withdrawn and placed in position to superintend the interests of the manufactory, now completed, and which stands to-day a monument to the indomitable perseverance of its worthy head. There are few men possessing the capabilities of MR. F. A. GILES as a businessman; he wields the vast interests and details of this establishment with perfect ease, and with as much physical as mental power, he watches closely and jealously every department, and is ever ready to lend a hand in all cases in the public or social duties, and is the more beloved of the estimation so justly placed by the world at large on the watches manufactured by him.

W. A. WALES, Esq., is one of those gentlemen who are—to be sadly forgotten. Having had experience all the disadvantages possible in his early efforts to rise, he is always ready to cheer and encourage the young man striving to win himself position. Active of limb and vigorous of intellect, he is exerted both mind and body to the furtherance of any and every plan suggested for the need and benefit of the business, and, in so doing, has rendered the association of the firm a most happy one for all concerned.

To C. D. F. WALES, Esq., the junior member of the firm, we find all the elements of the true business man, solid and determined in the prosecution of truths, genial, generous, and decided in character, he has won himself a host of friends, both in active and private life. Those coming under his immediate control are always solicitous of his personal interest, while all with whom he is brought in contact exclaim: "It is good to know him." Each and all of the gentlemen possessing a common cause, bearing with each others' peculiarities, and ever ready to lend a helping hand to the weak or needy member. F. A. GILES, Esq., their honored, his indefatigable laborer, carved themselves out a name that will lengthen and brighten as the annals of American mechanism are held up for general admiration by time worthy gentlemen.

THE FACTORY.

There is no doubt about the factory the largest as well as the model manufactory in the world. It is located at MARION, New Jersey, only fifteen minutes distant from New York, and is on the line of the New Jersey Railroad. The principal building is 250 feet in length, is built almost entirely of iron and glass, and is remarkable in its construction in point of light and ventilation. The grounds of the establishment comprise three or more acres, are beautifully laid out, and, being surrounded by a unique iron fence, it has more the appearance of a private park than that of a manufactory in which are employed more than four hundred men coming and going from and boarded of the company's celebrated watches daily.

The entire machinery used by this company for the production of their watches is a credit to them, and is consistently ahead of any other manufactory in this country in this particular. The building is in the form of a T, the design of which excites the admiration of all who see or are formed as to see it, and the interior arrangements are perfect for the convenience and comfort of all concerned. Sets of pipes, of which there are a number arranged throughout the building, are used respectively for light, heat, and the supplying of water. Great care has been exercised in guarding against accident by fire, every room and hallway being supplied with fire-hose, so that every part of the building can be reached in case of fire. Great care is taken in the arrangements for the vast number of employes as perfect: hot and cold water, with numbers of water-closets in the cellars, of which there are two, are the well-known "Harvison." On this floor the heavier work is performed, and here are being wrought in shape from the crude materials; there is also storage for the various tools used in pressing into shape all the parts and movements of a watch. Where steel enters in the construction of a watch, the American only is used, as that has been found to be the most reliable and durable. Every watch with any degree of reliability, the imported article, sometimes, having defects that condemn it entirely. The only imported articles used by THE UNITED STATES WATCH COMPANY are the precious stones for jewelling the movements and the enamel used in making the dials. In the room set aside for the use of mechanics in the construction of machinery used in the establishment, there is a corps of some 25 men, whose sole business is to make and keep in repair the various machines throughout the building, of which there are something like 200, and with just cause for pride in, two alike, each one of which has been designed and adapted for an especial purpose. Some of the machines are novelties, performing as they do various portions of the work, that in the ordinary course of machine used are various, yet, in its performance of them all, is of the most delicate, as it cuts and weighs the eighty-part of the weight to the wire, being but as fine as a hair. It is cut off, headed, the thread cut, and screwed in its position simultaneously; while in many other cases, so minute is the work, and so elaborately must it be performed, that a dozen machines all in its completion.

In the centre of the second floor the office of the superintendent is situated, and in which the private drawings are kept. The drawings of all parts of the movements are on an enlarged scale, and upon which are marked the measurements of the private standard gauge that is used by this company. So accurate is the machine that the very smallest possible fractional of difference can be divined, even to the twenty-fifth part of a hair, and by the use of which the parts, that, and to store the enormous required on the part of every movement, we will say that the finest hair from the human head will show by this steering finger a difference of one-half inch.

The process of making the compensating balances is one of interest; they are made of brass and steel, formed, then screws, perfect in every particular, head, slot, and thread—yet so small that it takes more than five hundred thousand of them to weigh a pound, or more than forty thousand to a single ounce! and to be seen to advantage the eye must be aided by a magnifying glass of some power.

The jewels used in these precious stones are cut by hand with a diamond, after we consider their extreme hardness and brittle nature; but ingenuity has again displayed itself and been brought to bear especially upon this point, and every obstacle overcome, so that the hardest stone is worked with comparative ease. Among the stones used for jewelling purposes are the ruby, sapphire, Spanish topaz, garnet, chrysolite, and aqua-marine, the more valuable of which are used in the larger grade of watch. The process of working these gems is one requiring great care, and the many operations necessary before they are brought to an acceptable condition. To make the ruby pivots, working in the slot of the fork, the rough stone is first sawn into slabs, after which it is sawn into squares; they are then taken to the lathe and turned with diamond-pointed tools, then they undergo a series of finishing powder, and when completed the subject of all this labor is but one-sixteenth part of an inch in length, and about the thickness of a very fine needle.

On the third floor the "motion room" is situated. In this room all the "motion works" are fitted, including the main-spring barrels, the winding and the stop works. One specialty in the construction is to being able to take out the barrel without taking apart the whole movement; affording great facility for putting in a new main spring. The jewels for the pivot holes are pressed in, and the train for jewelling and the insertion of the jewels are here performed. Then comes the escaping, making the escapements, fitting the plates, etc., all of which require the utmost skill and experience. The "finishing" and "adjusting" departments occupy the fifth floor, and are the most important rooms only in the firm, is performed with nicest doors, as also the room devoted to experimenting. In examining some of the finer movements made in this company, we find them made entirely of steel, their beauty of finish excited our special admiration, and it is on this class of work that the dissatisfaction is shown in all parts of the country. The work required in this style has the appearance of watered silk, and far surpasses any thing of the kind ever before attempted.

The fourth floor may be denominated the great workroom of the establishment. Here the different parts, numbering 400 or more to each watch, are brought for final adjustment, and here are given with reference to the effect of heat, cold, position, and "isochronism," the finishing touches to the movements, so that at the end of a number of months there will be no perceptible difference in its running. This is something that has turned the ingenuity of many, but has been left for the genius of this house to perfect. It is well understood that in the manufacture of watches, after the round, possesses a perfect uniformity in attained. The testing of a watch is made every twelve hours, and the variation in the movements is carefully recorded. Should any watch be found to leave the adjustment standard in this room are two pieces of apparatus for the perfection of the final test. One of these two apparatuses is cooled by means of ice, so that the temperature last-named to zero; the other has been from experiments, and tested until it has attained 180 degrees, in which the watch must run alternately, without any variation in time. The time consumed in this test is about one week; but a greater degree of exactness cannot be obtained than can be gained in six months by any of the methods practiced in Europe.

After the adjustment the works are sent to the compensation department, and from there to the "Full Plate Model Lever Watch." This depository is worthy a visit, and no one that is in the habit of visiting the city should fail to see the many beautiful specimens of watch-work that are displayed in the Ameri-can-window keepers in store. Novelties of every description in the way watch trade greet the eye, among which are of exceeding great value. Here are watches richly embellished with various kinds of valuable stones, some whose cases are fairly incrusted with diamonds, and having as design and color of the rose and lovers, or like as if they had been placed there by the pencil of the artist. Here are watches engraved in pure gold and solid gold, some of which are marvels in point of execution and workmanship, others again that look useful as well as ornamental. The points of use which we saw were admirable, viz.: when it is desired to set a key to wind a watch, but in no way is a specialty of this house, and for which several patents are held. They are the most simple and the most perfect yet produced, and eventually will be the only style of watch that will have favor with the public; the hands are not also from the stem; it strikes the hours, loud, distinct, and musical, and instead of striking the hour it strikes the quarters and the minutes, so that in the dark the hour, quarter, and the time and the minute. Other watches in cases, in various styles, have the hour-hand on the face, and when the hour-hand is at a different point; while in other materials, such as the "Ivory Dial," the hands are of the same shade inscribed. Here, as in the manufactory, the master mind is shown in the management of its affairs. Order is the first law—without it all would be confusion. All engaged here are imbued with the same spirit that characterizes the establishment, and in which they rightly enforce, enabling them to roll on the business, and guard against the many interests involved.

Many are the certificates from leading men in this country as to the perfection of the watches bearing the name "United States Watch Company," but the most astonishing one is from the Hon. L. E. CHITTENDEN,

Watch No 1059. bearing Trade Mark Frederic Atherton & Co. Marion N.J. Manufactured by United States Watch Co. has been carried by me from december 1868 to Jan 1st 1870. Its total variation being only two Seconds in the entire time. New York Jany 17th 1870 ists Register of the United States Treasury, in which he states that "Watch bearing trade-mark—Non-Explosive Alberton & Co., Marion, N. J., carried by him from December, 1868, to January 15, 1870, had a total variation of only two seconds in the entire time." This is perfection, and is, without doubt, the very acme of mechanical skill, brought to perfection by the energy and patient labor of F. A. GRAY, Esq., the worthy President of the United States Watch Company, and the senior member of the house of GRAY, WARD, & CO.

L. E. Chittenden
Late Register U.S. Treasury

This firm is fortunate in having for its controlling head a man of such rare mechanical genius and undoubted integrity, who is possessed of great foresight, ambition, and the most unswerving honesty. What he does is always well done; and what he engages to receives his entire attention. His reputation, his life of honest, earnest, successful endeavor, are exacted of themselves to assign him the first place in the front rank of American manufacturers. In addition to the many honors already received by this house, we will add that they have just received another for the watch made to them, which was the first prize at the Louisiana State Fair held at NEW ORLEANS for the month of 1870, over all competitors. It is well deserved, and we wish them every and a long-continued success.—[COM.]

Want of Vitality.

Sometimes there is a lack of vitality in large and apparently well-developed frames. The muscles, nerves, and muscles are not always indicative of stamina and constitutional vigor as to their generation. Many people move upon the condition of the stomach, the liver, and the bowels than upon the breadth of the shoulders or the size of loose nerves and pulleys of the system, as the vehicle strength of a machine. All this grand animal machinery is of itself so protective against sickness and decay. Rosy and perfect digestion, regular and healthy secretions, unobstructed blood, and a regular discharge of the waste matter of the body through the intestines, kidneys, and the pores, are the most potent safeguards against disease, the best guarantees of longevity. To promote these objects is the great end and purport of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters.

The ingredients of which the Great Tonic and Alterative is compounded are taken solely from the vegetable kingdom, and their medicinal virtues are concentrated thereon by the acid and poisonous elements which exist, more or less, in all the previous mineral drugs. Sufferers from indigestion, biliousness, intermittent fevers, nervous debility, or constipation, not only find immediate relief from the use of the Bitters, but permanent and invigorated, but become conscious, as time goes on, of a steady and constitutional improvement and vital force. Labor and exposure no longer produce the same effect upon them. Their system is fortified by the remedy, and they are rendered proof against a new hold on life, a new reserve of physical and mental energy. This has been the experience of thousands of both sexes, and every day adds to the mass of corroborative testimony. Whenever the temperature and state of the atmosphere exercise a depressing influence upon individuals and bodies of invalids, HOSTETTER'S BITTERS will be found quite sufficient to check they can rely for swift and permanent restoration.

NEWTON EXPERIMENTING WITH LIGHT.—FROM A PAINTING BY J. A. HOUSTON.—[SEE PAGE 424.]

BROKEN OFF.

MEG said unto a prince of story-tellers,
"Tell us another tale!"
And yet, beside the hills, stood phantom knellers,
And his voice was ill to tell.

At first he faltered, saying, "I am weary,
And the words are slow to come,
Across my ken flit visions dim and eerie,
And 'tis sweet to keep at home!"

But the clamor rose, by many voices strengthened;
And one voice in his heart
Grew louder as the spring-tide shadows lengthened:
"As I live, it is all spurt!

"Be prender than to wait with fingers folded,
Scared, looking out for death:
Drop not the habit which thy life hath moulded
But with thy lease of breath!"

He passed his hand across his heavy forehead,
And then across his eyes;
Before him rose a spectre, dim and horrid,
With these replies:

"The name by which men name me, while they shiver,
It is Sentiv'ment!
Leave all thy latest arrows in their quiver,
Or 'guns to me thy breath!"

Ah me! this prince of worthy story-tellers
Stood and beneath the sun;
For he could see where stood the phantom knellers—
But the story was begun!

Some said: "It is the story of all stories!"
And others: "Lo! he fails!
His later can not match his earlier glories—
He falters in the pales!"

But men proved round him, eagerly, to listen;
And all the one forgot,
He ranged the smile to shine, the tear to glisten;
And still—his voice was not!

The tale was but begun—the web half woven—
The colors scarcely mixed—
The counting of his hand was not yet proven—
His intent hardly fixed.

For the dark comrade who walked with his walking
Laid lightly on his lip
A cold forefinger—and he ceased from talking—
Suddenly—without slip.

Ah! still lips locked on the mysterious story!
Ah! hand that can not hold
The pen by which he earned his meed of glory—
He's dead! and 'tis not told!

THE PRESENT AND CUBA.

THE President's Cuban message probably will determine the action of the House upon the subject. Both the majority and minority reports were set aside. Cuba was not recognized as a belligerent, and the resolutions were not changed in favor of the island; but the President was instructed to use his influence with both parties to moderate the ferocity with which the war is waged. Yet, but for the very plain and positive statement of the message, the House, in its present condition of general indifference, and mindful of the tradition of manifest destiny, would very possibly have supported General BANKS's proposal, which is conceived in the spirit of that tradition. The propriety of the President's conduct in sending the message has been questioned. But nothing is plainer than the constitutional power and duty of an executive communication upon public affairs to Congress, "as he shall judge necessary and expedient." And the perfect vindication of the President's course upon this occasion lies in the fact that it undoubtedly produced the result which the best judgment of the country approves, and which was otherwise very doubtful.

The ground taken by the President is that which has been maintained by all those who have opposed the interference of the United States. Belligerence is a question of fact, not of sentiment. Long and fierce fighting is not necessarily war. Before belligerence could be honorably conceded to the Cubans there must be a situation there which does not exist; and the Monroe doctrine is not a declaration that when a colony declares its independence, and fights for it, it shall be recognized as a belligerent, but only when "the movement assumed such a steady and consistent form as to make the success of the provinces probable." General BANKS thinks that there is both a civil war in the international sense, and an organized civil government acknowledged by two-thirds of the Cubans, and operative over three-quarters of the island. But those facts are very shadowy. The President says that he can not ascertain that the government, as it is called, exists beyond the camp and the armed lines. And has any one who has diligently studied the reports from the island, and who is uncommitted to any thing but the truth, been able to reach any other conclusion? General BUTLER applied the reductio ad absurdum to General BANKS's report, by showing that if its statement of the duration of the rebellion and of the number of "principal battles"—which General BANKS placed at two hundred—were correct, there had been a "principal battle" every four or five days.

General BANKS and General LOGAN, in their ardent appeals, declared that we were guilty of the slaughter of Cubans, and of the sacrifice of liberty in America, if we do not interfere. They are mistaken. The United States are no more responsible for the crimes of the Spanish VALMASEDA than for those of the Cuban QUESADA; nor are they morally bound to undertake the righting of wrongs in Cuba more than in other countries. It is not necessary to exaggerate, and General BUTLER very truly said that no subject had ever been more signally misnamed by its especial friends than the cause of Cuba. The American people are generous in their sympathies; but they deeply respect their own well-considered laws and their own interests. The effect of any oppressed people to break the yoke of tyranny appeals strongly to the conviction of duty which all governments are justly founded in the consent of the governed; but the country does not therefore feel it to be its duty to actively take part in every such movement. We are not a sentimental people, and when General BANKS says, in his report, that the "prayers" of the people of the country for the success of the Cubans "are well-nigh universal," his statement is so conspicuously extravagant that it invests the whole report, which is written in that key, with an air of utter exaggeration.

The simple truth is, that the people of this country are conscious that they know very little of the Cuban facts, and they wish to adhere to the honorable traditions of the government in foreign affairs. They wish well to the Cubans: but we doubt whether they believe the oppression of the old government has justified organized action against a movement that overthrew it in the interests of liberty and progress. We doubt very much whether they are prepared to plunge in this country in the ability of the Cubans to maintain a popular system. Meanwhile it is known that the Cuban revolutionary movement have declared for annexation to the Union, and it is by no means self-evident that it is for the interest of liberty, or of this country, that a large our population at the present time with nearly two millions of a tropical people, many of them said to have "African blood flowing in their sand," as General BANKS says in his report, speaking "only the languages of the tribes of Africa."

These are considerations which do not, of course, affect the justice of the Cuban revolt; but they very seriously affect the question of which it is regarded. And whenever that revolt assumes "such a steady and consistent form" as to make its success probable, it will be the duty of the Executive to recognize it. But atrocities on both sides, a smouldering insurrection, or even a show into temporary government, the absence of all the usual forms of war, a revolutionary decree of emancipation, impotent dealings in Cuban bonds, absurd aversions of the character of the Secretary of State, and rabid assets as the President, do not establish that actual state of things in the island without which the interference of the United States—and General BANKS's resolutions indorsed nothing less—would be a flagrant wrong and a crime. The intelligence and good sense of the country have spoken in the President's message.

"FOURTH OF JULY BUSINESS."

GENERAL BUTLER made a speech during the Cuban debate in which he said, that if he were asked whether he would go to war at once with Spain, he should answer, "as a Fourth of July business," yes; but as a statesman, no. It is a good characteristic of the wit and the great service if honorable gentlemen would announce, when they begin to speak, how they are to be addressed. If General BUTLER, for instance, should say, "Mr. Speaker, I rise this morning to transact a little Fourth of July business," there would be the usual unanimity standing, and his "effort" might be very much relished from the Fourth of July point of view. If Mr. General LOGAN, having a similar purpose to certain statements, or an apparent hostility to the Administration, should briefly say, "Mr. Speaker, I would address the House upon a man that my remarks were merely part of the Fourth of July business upon which I was then engaged," there would be the usual unanimity and mutual intelligence. Imagination can readily picture the honorable inquirer as reclassifying with a smile, "Oh!" and resuming his seat with entire satisfaction.

So, also, one honorable gentleman might courteously interrupt another, and say, "I beg the gentleman's pardon; but I should like to inquire if this is meant for serious argument, or is merely Fourth of July business?" The only inconvenience would be the necessity of constant interruption for the purpose of such an inquiry. This might, however, be obviated by a standing order, that every Saturday should be given up to Fourth of July business. Or, indeed, if on days in general it were considered for that purpose, and such business were rigorously excluded upon all other days, there would be immense gain to the public in science and the public patience. Any member might rise to a point of order, and call Mr. Speaker's attention to the fact that the honorable gentleman was lapsing into the Fourth of July business, upon which the Speaker would pleasantly beg gentleman to remember that Fourth of July came but twice a week.

General BUTLER's remark suggests the enormous quantity of Fourth of July business that is done in Congress and in the press. It is business which proceeds upon the assumption that the nation is a great, ignorant, prejudiced boy, whose sole delight is to boast and bluster. The honorable gentleman who states an undeniable truth with a sinister intention, and begins, solemnly, "The American people, Mr. Speaker, are the only rightful source of power," is a wholesale dealer in Fourth of July business. Contemptuous reference to England as a power which, in the interests of human liberty, Sir, must be bundled, Sir, bundled—is unmitigated Fourth of July business. Cooper Institute meetings, just before election, to declare with vehemence that Ireland is for the Irish, and that every united party have to stand with the men at the gap, is the most conventional of all Fourth of July business. The assertion that free republican American sledlaus to learn any thing of the details of administration from the systems practiced in the effete monarchies of the Old World, is Fourth of July business. Indeed, the general declaration that we have proved our strength and that we are big enough to do as we are disposed to do, and that a blow at Spanish is conclusive proof of the wisdom and honor of any proposition, is the most common and contemptible Fourth of July business.

Whatever is done to please the vast constituency of Buncombe is Fourth of July business. But let us hope that our national resolutions next week may show us that not these things, but noble and honorable statesmanship, is the real Fourth of July business that we ought always to have in hand.

GENTLEMEN IN MITRES.

IN these long, warm days the incessant announcement of Papal Rome that the declaration of infallibility is coming becomes at last as unheeded as the warning of the coming wolf. Public interest grows so languid as almost to expire, and it is probably not very generally understood even now whether the dogma has been declared or not. "There is something so preposterous," said a very genuine American, as he was speaking of the Roman Council, "in the men, in their red hats and red stockings, solemnly declaring another man to be infallible upon any subject whatever, that it would be impossible seriously to discuss it were not really said." But the essential folly of declarations is not so much the important point as their sincerity and seriousness; for, in one's whole theme to support them at all hazards. What more amusing conceit is there than the divine right of kings, or what more absurd than the sentiment of loyalty? O Richard! O mon roi! How gladly men have suffered and died for a man in no manner worthy of better than contempt, merely because they chose to take a certain view of him? Think of the splendid eulogies of EDMUND BURKE over the British monarchy, and of poor old GEORGE the Third as the English monarch! "Your Majesty's self is but a creature," said the minister to the French king. But what a ceremony! Take off his periwig and robes, said THACKERAY, and what a sorry reminder! But the more ridiculous and the grander, the more remarkable the undoubted fact that FRENCHMEN agreed to honor him and even reverence him as king.

So with the Pope. When a few scores of very fallible gentlemen called bishops put on certain queer caps of bedizened pasteboard, and robed inside called mitres, and assembling in a magnificent temple amidst the prodigious pomp of music and chanted prayers, declare that the word of another very fallible gentleman with a triple crown upon his head shall settle the mode to be fealty of any religious body, the important fact is not that the proceeding is excessively amusing, but that millions of very sensible persons gravely acquiesce in it, and will govern themselves accordingly, even if they must plunge their countries into the horrors of war, and forever their beloved city of Rome flames. No human being, of course, can, in any just sense of the words, believe what does not seem to him to be true; and to believe what seems to him untrue, because somebody else says that it seems true to him, is impossible. But the dogma of infallibility is not a matter of opinion, and therefore it is useless to reason upon its absurdity. It is not accepted because it is reasonable. It will not be acted upon because it is reasonable. Its supporters would doubtless tell us that it transcends reason. What they wish to know, therefore, is how it will affect civilization.

Practically, although the Council attempts to define and limit the dogma, the great mass of the adherents of the Roman Church will, of course, understand it as an assertion of general infallibility, and consider religion the most vital of interests, and hold that religion and Romanism are identical. The man who is the untruly head of such a body being infallible, will be to them essentially divine. They will not discriminate his papal from his personal attributes. And as he is an earthly ruler as well as a heavenly lesser, they would, in the degree that they are sincere, inevitably and naturally hold with him in any quarrel, even with the rulers or the authorities of their own countries. It was this feeling, and nothing else, which enabled HILDEBRAND and the other Popes to declare and to maintain their supremacy over kings and emperors, to dethrone them, to degrade them, and practically to establish the principle that the Pope could release subjects from their allegiance. DANTE's treatise upon Monarchy was condemned as heretical because he asserted that the Emperor held by divine right, and not by permission of the Pope.

It is to a return to this ancient claim of the Roman Church at a time when it dominated Christendom that the declaration of Infallibility is interesting. It is the sign of a tendency to concentrate and intensify a power which had become relaxed. That power, indeed, is not likely to set in the old manner, but its purpose and its spirit are necessarily unchanged. It will hardly declare the English people released from their allegiance to the Queen, but it is not altogether unlikely to urge, with polished and plausible and deprecatory arguments, that the school money be divided in the United States. In so doing the papal power will be seeking its own supremacy, and those who work its will will be, at best and essentially, not Americans, but obedient to a foreign and alien authority. It is in this way that the declaration of the three or four hundred gentlemen in mitres that one of their number is God on earth becomes important to those who must necessarily smile as they recall the words of a shrewd author: "The Court of Rome was not speedily alarmed at these freedoms. She reposed with a generous confidence upon the folly and blindness of mankind."

MR. HOAR'S RETIREMENT.

THE retirement of ATTORNEY-GENERAL HOAR is a national loss. His ability, his integrity, and his experience were of the utmost service to the Administration, and commended it most earnestly to the confidence of the country. Not much known beyond his own State when he was appointed, Mr. HOAR leaves his office with the general conviction that his qualities are precisely those which can be least spared at Washington. His political convictions are profound. They are the mistake of the depth and force of his character. But his sagacity and good sense are not less remarkable; and he clearly sees the point where party property merges in patriotism. He has steadily refused to favor a system of the civil service which, while of doubtful partisan expediency, is a sure calamity to the country. Capacity, experience, fidelity, and loyalty have seemed to him proper qualifications for the management of General affairs; and an honorable independence of personal ambition, and an honorable regard for wise precedent and international justice, the best principles of foreign policy.

Personally, his retirement must be very unwelcome to the President, as, indeed, he intimates, "for any evident points of strong sympathy between them. The phrase, "a rock of sense," well describes the late Attorney-General; and the value of such a foundation in public administration no one can appreciate more truly than General GRANT. Mr. HOAR's successor is likely to be known; but Mr. HOAR's own case has shown us that that is not a serious misfortune. We can only wish him the highest integrity, ability, and independence of his predecessor; and that when he withdraws it may be with the same general feeling of grateful respect and sincere regret that attends the retirement of Mr. HOAR from the Cabinet.

FOREIGN DEMAND FOR OUR BREADSTUFFS.

THE concurrence of a Continental demand for our breadstuffs simultaneously with that from Great Britain is likely to prove of much benefit to the United States. No. 2 Milwaukee wheat, which on the 20th of May was quoted at $1 06 per bushel, had advanced on the 16th of June to $1 35. This may be taken as a fair indication of the general improvement. Very large transactions on French account had occurred, due to the extreme drought prevailing in important agricultural districts. The telegram that cattle were dying for want of pasturage and water may be an exaggeration; but as far as it is a natural extent, it is easily seen, the effects of want of rain are much more serious in France than in England, where the subsoil is very retentive. The Paris correspondent stated that flour had risen in Paris about $1 per barrel.

It is impossible to arrive with precision at the full extent of the foreign demand which may arise, as the United States are not supplied with any information except from foreign sources. For the want of it, obtained through our consular establishment in the mode often indicated by us, our large grain-producing interest is ever at the mercy of the foreign purchaser. Lately the price at which our grain has been sold has been unremunerative. We sincerely hope that the tide has turned, and that it may not be necessary to make further sacrifices. In presenting all the information within our reach, it should be borne in mind that the most powerful efforts will be made to check the advance by all the means which the combined interests of the English and the French may employ. After the drought in England of 1868 the Daily News stated that there existed "a political necessity for cheap bread." This is equally true of France. The large purchases to and including the 15th June were supposed to have been on account of the French Government.

The returns of exports of wheat to Europe for the week ending on the 14th of June indicate that the causes which are operating in France are not confined to that locality. The quantities exported at New York, as stated from the Custom-house returns, are as follows: Hamburg, 20,000 bushels; Bremen, 10,812; Havre, 79,169; Liverpool, 180,153; London, 62,500; Glasgow, 31,752; Gloucester, 25,343; Plenarth Roads, 22,496; Cork, 127,553; Lisbon, 17,096. The exports of wheat from the United States for the eight months of the fiscal year, which terminated on the 30th of November last, amounted to 28,372,219 bushels, as against 8,858,329 for the corresponding period in 1869. Its value is stated at $36,464,000, as against $15,334,152 for the like period in 1869. The loss on corn and meal was $4,914,405; but the gain on the value of flour exported was about $2,500,000. As this export is largely in excess of what is usual, the question arises to what extent it will continue.

The estimated annual consumption of wheat in Great Britain, made by Mr. Caird in the spring of 1868, was one hundred and ninety millions four hundred thousand bushels, of which he supposed that seventy-six millions eight hundred thousand bushels would need to be imported. By the returns of the imports to the 28th of May last it appeared that the following quantities of grain and flour had been imported into the United Kingdom since the 1st of September:

	1869–1870.		1868–1869.
	Imports.	Quarters.	Imports.	Quarters.
Wheat	80,468,925	10,062,616	60,760,266	7,595,033
Barley	8,179,561	1,021,195	10,903,000	1,362,875
Oats	7,916,999	988,374	8,561,462	99,401
Peas	1,496,000	187,000	1,811,000	226,375
Beans	1,579,858	9,763	2,047,708	4,051
Indian corn	8,753,079	1,094,134	6,015,797	751,974
Flour	4,758,292	19,809	2,937,556	26,057

These imports, which are stated in hundredweighs, show a gain over those of 1869; but it would appear that the import for the present grain year will much exceed the quantity estimated by Mr. Caird in 1868. The Manchester Guardian, in the list of May, considered high authority in England, presents the following views as to the present condition of the crops:

"Continued dry weather has had the effect of enhancing the value of wheat throughout the week, during the last few days, to the extent of 1s. to 2s. per quarter, and a similar advance has been established at Mark Lane to-day. It has been maintained by some that, inasmuch as one of the most abundant crops on record was secured in 1868 after a period of unusual drought, a similar result may be anticipated from the drought of 1870 and that of 1868, however, are widely different; and while the one contributed to fertilize, the other may lead to scarcity. The dry weather which prevailed during the two or three months before harvest in 1868 commenced at a time when the wheat plant was nearly fully developed, and when the yield of a crop were very decided. The blooming period had been unfortunately passed, after which, if it had been under favorable circumstances, is capable of sustaining, and, indeed, of thriving under a period of drought and heat. The drought of the present year commenced at a period immediately succeeding spring sowing, and consequently all spring-sown grain passed but a poor existence of yielding well. In some districts spring wheat has proved a failure, and in many it has been rescued with other crops. As regards winter wheat the prospects are good; but the drought, if it is copious fall of rain is delayed, the prospect even here will be discouraging. The season, however, is considered to be very backward, and a very light crop of hay is anticipated. This, with the probability of a deficiency in the yield of spring corn in this country, will necessitate larger purchases abroad of barley, oats, beans, and peas, and at a higher price. The last report published by the Agricultural Department of 1st February, in reference to the growing crop, states that, so far as wheat was then sown it looked well, but complaints of cold winds appeared to have done much harm; but it was remarked that, on the whole, the crops in general looked vigorous; and it was expected that the influence of a favorable spring would render the prospects extremely promising. In New England the winter grain which was sown was doing well, though the frost had visited, with unfortunate results, some of the northern counties of Maine and New Hampshire. In more than one-half of the counties of New York the reports are favorable, and the same is the case with New Jersey. In Pennsylvania the growth is more backward. In Ohio, Delaware and Maryland some damage is reported; but in the Southern States more than an average crop is looked forward to. In Kentucky the harvest promises to be much larger than usual. In Tennessee the Commissioner reports the growth as below the average in the majority of counties; but some of the Gulf and Pacific States expect about an average crop. On the whole, the returns in regard to the winter-sown crops would seem to be evident that there is very little prospect of no abundant a crop as in 1868. The crop of wheat in California is expected to be about three-fourths of that secured in 1868."

The particularity with which the article refers to States which produce no wheat for export, and the manner in which it dismisses the great wheat region, show a want of information but it affords some evidence that at present the United States are relied upon to furnish their needed supplies.

The San Francisco News-Letter of May 28 states that accounts from all parts of the State, where the crop was not utterly ruined by the hot spell which terminated May 7, "indicate a great improvement in the appearance of the young wheat," but the cold weather of the last three weeks had revived much of the grain which appeared ruined, and that many fields which the owners expected to cut for hay would produce grain. The price of choice lots, which on the 29th of April was $1 621 per quintal, was then, however, $1 80 to $1 90 per quintal. It had been as high as $1 90 to $2. These prices make it an object to foreigners to deal rather with New York at present.

The indications are that a demand will continue up to the harvest of 1870 for our breadstuffs; but a portion of the grain purchased on French account has already been resold, owing either to more favorable crops in France, Russia, or to the object of affecting our market injuriously.

THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

BY JOHN JONES, A.M.

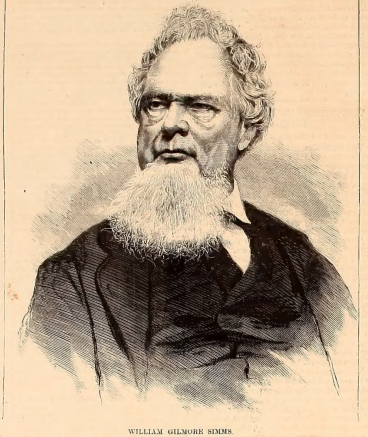
THE Exhibition will close by the time this paper is issued, I believe, at least therefore omit the many admirable and apposite remarks that I had proposed to make upon other pictures. But I cannot let it go unconscious. When I was younger and only beginning to exhibit, if some BEN CLOD or SCOTTEN TAIL of a critic came whooping down upon me in a newspaper, I instantly gave up all for lost, and awaited extinction. But I presently opened my eyes gloriously, and perceived that I remained very much as they were. People still took a nod at me in the street as the hapless painter who had been annihilated by the critics, and the waiters at the humble restaurant whither I went to dine did not seem to be conscious that I was the incapable who had put in the cowpaper, with subtle satire, as evidently mistaking my vocation and endeavoring to paint portraits instead of signs. I therefore felt that I owed it to myself, "Perhaps, after all, every body doesn't read this assault in the paper, and perhaps those who do don't remember it two minutes afterward."

That was an immense consolation; and then, in later days, I have remonstrated with my fellow-academicians for their exceeding wrath at the glibness of the Tribune, and they have said to me that every body in the country read the Tribune, and believed every thing in it, because they supposed that MR. GREELEY, who knew every thing, wrote his own articles, and was too heavyred to comfort them by telling them that I hadn't believe one in a hundred ever read the attacks of newspapers. The consolation is that it is remarkable that when I said that, my fellow-academicians did not seem to be in the least degree comforted. Yet by their logic they ought.

Of course persistent attacks in a newspaper upon any man of any profession will at last tell. Nor do I deny that if I were the only publicist son of a new book the Tribune, or any other powerful daily paper, should declare it to be utterly worthless. But very few books and few notices of pictures remember what they have said when they come to the gallery. And as for those who remember it, many, if they have, for instance, that the pictures of JOHN JONES, A.M., N.A., are always described as pitiful and ridiculous, they will naturally like to see what of him as they do of TITIAN or RAPHAEL, whose works, also, they have never seen. The greater pity for them, of course, if the description were supposed; but what I wish to impress upon my fellow-artists is, that the sharp or sneering mention of their pictures in a notice does more to do half as much damage as they suppose. I could name seven persons in society made very conscious lessons of self-complacency by the sneers were looking at them. Far from it. Other persons were thinking that every body was looking at them.

So I am constrained to say that I fear my remarks will find very little store to the laurels of those whom I have pointed out, and those whom I might have censured would not be likely to heed them. I have left, by choice, all

WILLIAM GILMORE SIMMS.



WILLIAM GILMORE SIMMS.

In the death of MR. SIMMS, on the 11th of June, at Charleston, the country has lost one more of its time-honored band of authors, and the South the most consistent and devoted of her literary sons. Born in 1806, of a good family, though not among the wealthy proprietors of the State, MR. SIMMS grew up under favorable influences of culture, which were not thrown away upon his ingenuous, lively disposition. He early acquired a taste for reading, and some knowledge of the western languages. The assistance which he received, however, was but slight. The self-reliance and energy with which he marked out and pursued his career proclaim him essentially a self-made man. He studied law, was admitted to the bar at the age of twenty-one; but the real bent of his disposition was shown in the same year in the publication of two small volumes of lyrical poems at Charleston. Several others followed, and in 1832 he fairly began his career as an author by profession with the publication at New York, by the Messrs. HARPER, of "Atalantis," an imaginative poem—a tale of the sea—of considerable merit. The next year appeared his first prose romance, "Martin Faber," from the same house, followed by "Guy Rivers," "The Yemassee," the precursors of a host of novels from his pen, running along the next thirty years. During all this period, and to the end of his life, MR. SIMMS's pen was never idle. Not only were his novels varied in character and object, embracing several distinct classes of works of fiction, but his poetical productions were numerous; he wrote dramas, histories of his native State, several volumes of biography, of MARION, General GREENE, and others; furnished multitudinous essays and critical articles to many periodicals, himself editing several, from the quarterly to the weekly newspaper; delivered also various public orations and addresses; in fine, was one of the most indefatigable authors of this or any age. All this work was done under the influence of a commanding genius, seconded by great physical powers. It bore the marks of thought and study. Its author had a genuine love of letters, the passion of his life. For this he turned aside from the immediate rewards of political life, almost irresistible at the South to one of his oratorical powers and ardent temperament. In fact, there have been few examples in the country of an exclusive and persistent pursuit of literature. The temper of mind which led him to this was essentially poetic and speculative. Though best known to the public as a novelist, he would, we believe, greatly have preferred to devote his powers to imaginative compositions in verse, with the lyrical predominant. His works of fiction are colored with this romantic element. Through how many kindling pages has he pursued his favorite topic, the exercise of the imagination in the culture of the beautiful, which with him meant love, reverence, the virtues for time and eternity! His last appearances in public, only a few weeks ago, leaving a couch of sickness for the effort, was to deliver an address before the Charleston County Horticultural Society, instinct with these ideas of his life. It is entitled, "The Sense of the Beautiful." Affection with full hand can sprinkle no choicer flowers upon his grave than the lilies and amaranthins blooms reared in the eye of heaven in this his own noble deathsong.

In his personal character, a man of singular simplicity and straightforwardness, of sound principles and honest impulses, ready in sympathy, friendly to the young, and where he was best known—in his family—of peculiar devotion and tenderness. His religious affections, tried by many domestic losses and severe privations, bore a lofty spirit of reverence and profound submission to the Divine will. We mention these traits now, for at his newly made grave the moral must take precedence of the intellectual; and they were qualities not always looked for by those at a distance, who, in the heat of national controversy, made but a rough estimate of the man. Those best acquainted with him, apart from the tribute which they may render to his writings, will ever regard tenderly and affectionately the memory of WILLIAM GILMORE SIMMS.

RED CLOUD.

THIS redoubtable chieftain and sundry of his dusky companions visited New York last week, and were interviewed and feted to their hearts' content. On the evening of June 16 they were treated to a grand reception at the Cooper Institute, at which it was estimated that no less than five thousand people were present. RED CLOUD made a very pathetic speech, in the course of which he said:

"I have tried to get from my Great Father what is right and just. I have not altogether succeeded. I want you to believe with me, to know with me, that which is right and just. I represent the whole Sioux nation. They will be grieved by what I represent. I am no SPOTTED TAIL, who will say one thing one day and be bought for a fish the next. Look at me! I am poor, naked, but I am chief of a nation. We do not ask for riches: we do not want much; but we want our children properly trained, brought up. We look to our Great Father to help us do it. Perhaps we can take them away with us out of the world, but we want to have love and peace. The money, the riches, that we have in this world, as SECRETARY COX lately told me, we can not take these into the next world. If this be so, I would like to know why the commissioners who are sent out there do nothing but rob to get the riches of this world away from us. I was brought up among traders and those who came out there in the early times. I had good times with them; they trusted me mostly always right; always well; they taught me to use clothes, to use tobacco, to use fire-arms and ammunition. This was all very well until the Great Father sent another kind of men out there—men who drank whisky; men who were so bad that the Great Father could not keep them at home, so he sent them out there."

RED CLOUD'S speech left on his audience the impression that his expectations had not been met at Washington, and that his intentions were not altogether pacific.

PREPARED EXPRESSLY FOR HARPER'S WEEKLY.

THE STORY OF A SHIPWRECK.

CHAPTER I.

The Auckland Islands.—The Storm.—Saved.—Mining.—The Cloth Merchant's Project.—Arrangements for an Expedition.—The Wreck.—On a Desert Island.

THE group of islands known as New Zealand lies about a thousand miles to the eastward of the southern extremity of Australia. About two hundred miles to the southward of New Zealand a small group of mountain summits rise above the surface of the sea, and are known by the name of the Auckland Islands. These islands have been the scene, within a few years past, of several remarkable shipwrecks—or, rather, shipwrecks followed by very remarkable adventures on the part of the poor seamen who experienced them. The circumstances connected with and following one of these disasters have been related in full by the leader of the party involved in it—a Frenchman named Raynal. We propose giving to our readers a narrative of the events connected with the shipwreck, and the subsequent residence of the party of mariners on the islands, following faithfully, in respect to the facts, the accounts given in the original narrative.

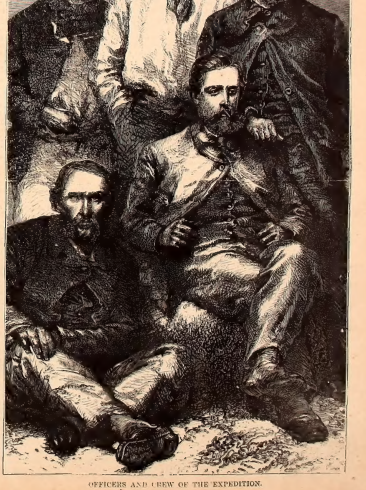
Mr. Raynal was a French gentleman, who went to Australia, twelve or fifteen years ago, to seek his fortune. He was destined, however, to encounter much more of ill luck than of good, and his misfortunes commenced even before his landing in Australia. The vessel in which he and the party accompanying him took passage for Melbourne was wrecked on approaching that port. When they were drawing near the land they encountered a gale of wind which raised a very heavy sea, and brought with it from the offing a flying mist so dense as to shut out every thing from view. While in this situation night came on: and soon afterward, in the midst of the darkness, the vessel struck upon a submerged reef of rocks. Immediately after the first terrible shock she swung round, and, falling down partially upon her side, became hopelessly entangled among the rocks, and her deck was immediately inundated by the seas which broke over her. Two of the crew were swept overboard and drowned. The others managed to save themselves by clinging to the shrouds and rigging. The vessel lay thumping upon the rocks until holes were broken through the planking, when she gradually settled down into a sort of hollow in the reef until the hull was entirely submerged. The men who had saved themselves clambered up the rigging to the main-top, where they huddled together, clinging to whatever came within their grasp, and spent the night there, in darkness and cold, and exposed to the whole fury of the storm. Enormous waves were rolling in incessantly beneath them, covering them with the spray, and threatening at every moment to carry away the mast and plunge them all into the boiling and foaming abyss over which they were suspended. Among all the frightful situations into which human beings are brought in encountering the sea, if we except being on board a burning ship in the middle of the ocean, with no possibility of being saved, it is difficult to conceive of any one more terrible than this.

The men were saved, however. The storm abated, and the mist cleared away before morning, when they were seen by people on board a steamer that was passing along the coast, and thus were rescued and taken into Melbourne.

Mining, they say, is a lottery. If so, it was one which was not destined to bestow any of its prizes upon Mr. Raynal. It is, in fact, eminently a lottery for gentlemen like Mr. Raynal, who, having some capital, employ and pay laborers, and depend for their reimbursement on the returns of enterprises which sometimes involve a very large outlay before the question of returns can be reached. For the laborer himself, who is content with the high daily wages that generally prevail in mining countries, and who has the self-control not to waste his earnings in dissipation or in gaming, the employment is as sure, perhaps, and as productive as any other. But this was not Mr. Raynal's case. He was an employer of laborers, and his ventures did not prove successful. He persevered, however, for several years, with varying results, but, on the whole, with an large a proportion of disappointment and failure that at length he became wholly discouraged. The last misfortune that befell him, and which finally decided him to abandon the life of a miner, was a very extraordinary one. It was as follows:

He had employed a body of men to dig a "drift," or tunnel, into the side of a hill, in search of a vein of the precious metal which he had reason to suppose existed there. The men had made a commencement of the work, under Mr. Raynal's superintendence; and one evening, when the labors of the day were closed, and he had dismissed them to go to their several homes, he himself remained behind them in the excavation to examine the walls of it, with a view of ascertaining whether it would be necessary to support the earth by timbers and planking, or whether it was sufficiently firm and tenacious to support itself. While trying the sand and gravel with this view, the bank suddenly began to give way and fall; and before he could make his escape from the hole he was overwhelmed and half buried under an avalanche of rocks, gravel, and sand. He was seriously wounded, too—his chest being nearly crushed in by the weight of the load which came upon it. He cried out as loudly as he could to his men; but they had gone too far to hear him. Then he commenced the work of trying to disengage himself. In this, after a time, he succeeded; and when he was free, he crawled, more dead than alive, to some neighboring place where he could receive succor. As soon as he could be moved he was taken to

BURIED IN THE MINE.



OFFICERS AND CREW OF THE EXPEDITION.

Sydney, where he remained, sick and a sufferer, for eight months before he recovered from the effects of the accident.

During this long period of confinement, which extended through the winter, Mr. Raynal had time to reflect upon his situation and prospects, and he came to the conclusion to undertake no more mining operations, but determined that, with the coming spring, if his health should then be sufficiently restored, he would return to France. In the mean time he had formed the acquaintance of a Norwegian named Mr. Charles Sarpy. Mr. Sarpy was a cloth merchant, and had for some time been engaged in business at Sydney; and when the time drew near for Mr. Raynal to set sail for his native land, Mr. Sarpy communicated to him, in a private and confidential manner, a project which he and his partner were entertaining, and proposed that Mr. Raynal should join them in carrying it into execution.

The project of Mr. Sarpy and his partner was this. They had received secret information, they said, that there were indications of valuable deposits of silver on an island called Campbell Island, which lies, as will be seen by the map, to the southward of New Zealand, and not far from the Auckland Islands, which, as will appear in the sequel, were the scene of most of the events to be recorded in this narrative. The plan was to fit out a vessel, with a trusty company in charge of it, to go to Campbell Island, and there make an exploration of the interior of it, with a view to ascertaining whether there was, in fact, such a mine of silver ore there as had been represented. If they found the mine the vessel was to return immediately to Sydney with the news, and the partners would then take the necessary steps for organizing a company to work the mine, and obtaining from the Legislature a grant of the island to the company, and the other necessary powers to enable them to prosecute the business profitably.

The expedition was, however, to be provided not only with the requisite implements, machinery, and materials for examining and testing the ore, if such should be found, but were also to take with them the necessary apparatus and implements for the seal-fishery, in order that, in case of disappointment in regard to the mine, they could indemnify the owners for the expense of the voyage by bringing back a cargo of sealskins and seal-oil. Most of the southern coasts and islands in high southern, as well as high northern, latitudes are resorted to by great numbers of seals and other marine mammalia; and Mr. Sarpy had heard that they were particularly abundant at Campbell Island, so that it should be the case a cargo was to be obtained and sold, even under the charge of a portion of the crew, while the rest remained to found an establishment on the island, and go on with the fishing, with a view of collecting a store of skins and oil, ready to load the vessel again on her return.

The proposal which Mr. Sarpy and his partner made to Mr. Raynal was, that he should aid them in organizing such an expedition, and should himself go out to Campbell Island in command of it.

Mr. Raynal concluded to accept this proposal. He thought that there was a great deal of interest, that one or the other of the two strings of the bow would hold, and that by means of it he might reach the mark which he had been fruitlessly aiming at for so many years. And at any rate, if both should fail, it would enable him once his return to his native land for a few months. He could decide the question about that on the other during the summer season upon which he was then just entering; and if he failed, could set out in his return to France in the fall.

The seal is a remarkable animal in many respects; and, among others, one of the most interesting affording a very curious example of the manner in which a structure originally designed, as it would seem, for a life in one element, is readily modified to adapt it for another. The seal is essentially, in its anatomical characteristics, a land animal. It has all the bones necessary for feet and hands, even to the fingers and toes. These bones are, however, all packed up and concealed in the integuments which form the tail and the fore-necessary for locomotion on land. It has a voice like that of a dog, and one species is known, on this account, among sailors as the sea-dog. It brings forth its young on land, nurses and takes care of them as a cat does her kittens, or a lion her whelps, and, when sleeping only eggs, like most of the inhabitants of the deep, and leaving them to take their chance of being hatched and fed, or devoured by other fishes, as the accidents of their condition may determine. Their eyes are bright and full, and have so meaning an expression that they seem almost human. The organ is provided, moreover, with a powerful semi-transparent lid, by which it can be covered, when necessary, and its internal structure is provided with a means of adjustment by which it can be adapted either to aquatic or aerial vision. Its nostrils are fitted with muscles by means of which they can be shut close and air when under water; so that the seal can rest its nose as well as its mouth when it dives. Its skull is very thin, to make the head light, so as to diminish the exertion necessary to keep it above the water. The limbs are short, and there are special arrangements in the structure of the hips and knees to prevent the submergence of the animal, from time to time, for breathing with the regular arterialization of the blood and the regularity of the circulation.

But the chief peculiarities in the structure of the seal, which enable the animal to yield products useful to man, are those connected with the arrangements for keeping him warm in the sea-cold water in which he spends so large a portion of his time. These peculiarities are two: the coating of "blubber" below the skin, and of fur above it. This "blubber," as the sailors call it, consists of an integument or envelope of a kind of cellular tissue, the vesicles of which are filled with oil, and which covers the animal in every part with a material which is at the same time buoyant, and thus aids him in his motions in the water, and also is an excellent non-conductor of heat, and thus enables the red blood circulating within to maintain its temperature, notwithstanding the intense cold of the surrounding medium. It is thus easy to see in an arctic region a thousand seals disporting themselves on the margin of the ice, at some times in the water and sometimes in the air, when the water is nearly freezing and the air is far below zero, apparently as much at ease in a fact a little package of warmth, so securely protected by its warm and admirable coat against cold, that, whether by day or by night, in summer or in winter, awake or asleep, upon the ice or under it, this warmth is not only kept up, but is never even varies in degree. It neither increases nor diminishes under all the circumstances of the continual and sometimes violent changes which take place in the surrounding conditions by which it is subject. But there is nothing found to be more uniform, as is shown by the most accurate experiments and observations, than the temperature of the red blood flowing in the veins and arteries of a mammal.

It is from these peculiar coatings with which nearly all warm-blooded marine animals are clothed that are derived the supplies with which to make the whales, the dolphins, the grampuses, the walruses, and the seals so valuable to man.

The seal, moreover, has a fur coat, also, preserving coat lying under his skin, is covered without with a peculiar kind of hair or fur, which makes him also specially adapted to many useful purposes. The value of it depends upon certain properties which belong to the fur as given by well under the water and in the air. Thus in the seal-fishery the sources of profit are two-fold—the skins and the oil.

The project therefore which Mr. Sarpy and his partner proposed to one of Mr. Raynal was that they should together fit out a vessel, with the means and appliances necessary both for collecting seal-skins and seal-oil on the islands, and for making explorations and testing the value of the ores on the shore. Mr. Raynal was to take the command of the vessel and of the expedition, and should set sail as soon as the necessary arrangements could be made.

Mr. Raynal acceded to the proposition. He, however, suggested that the arrangements for the plan, and that was that another captain should be engaged to take command of the vessel during the voyage. Although Mr. Raynal had sometimes been a practical navigator, it was many years, he said, since he had been at sea, and he wished to have another person to take the responsibility of conducting the vessel to the island. He was then himself to take charge of the operations on land—namely, the exploration of the island, and the testing and collecting specimens of the ores, and also the work of preparing a cargo of oil and seal-skins.

This arrangement was finally acceded to, and a young ship-master, Captain Musgrave by name, a nephew of Mr. Sarpy' partner, was engaged to take command of the vessel. The ship was 150 tons, and was about thirty years of age. He had a wife and children at Sydney. The vessel was named the Griffon, of about eighty tons burden, was purchased and fitted up for the voyage. She was originally a pilot-boat, and had been employed in bringing coal from Newcastle to Sydney. As she would have nothing to do during the season the voyage except empty casks, they put in an extra quantity of iron ballast in the hold, covering it with a shallow floor, well secured, so as to make the possibility of the ballast "shifting." They likewise thus obtained a number of iron water-casks were filled with water for the outward voyage; not only for the purpose of securing an abundant supply of water in case of a disappointment in island, but also in order to put the brig in the same trim as she would be when she would be on the homeward voyage, when the water would be filled with oil. They also placed some additional bulkhead, consisting of pieces of timber, on this flooring, with the water-casks, to give additional stability to the vessel.

The crew consisted of two seamen and a cook, making five in all; and, curiously enough, there were as many as seven passengers and supernumeraries in the group as there were men. Mr. Raynal was French, Captain Musgrave American, one of the seamen was English, the other was Norwegian, while the cook was Portuguese. The engraving gives a correct likeness of many of the whole party, copied from a photograph. Mr. Raynal stands on the extreme right of the picture, with the sea, his face wearing a pensive and thoughtful expression given to it by the disappointments and sufferings he had gone through which he had passed. His hand rests on the shoulder of the American, Captain Musgrave, whose countenance indicates the open and energetic character of the American ship-master wherever he is found. In the centre of the group, behind the others, is one of the seamen, the Norwegian, Alexander M'Larren by name, though always known on board the vessel as Alexander. Alexander was of a very quiet and sedate disposition. He was also quite active, and never laughed, but he was docile and obedient, and attended faithfully to all his duties. He could not read or write. The seaman next to Englishman, sits on the ground to the left of the group. His name was George Harris. He was very young—scarcely of age—though his form and his countenance would indicate a good deal of maturity both of body and mind. He was indeed rather an extraordinary man, strong, courageous, and active. He was a quick, clever man, understanding well whatever pertained to the rig and to the management of the vessel. He was, moreover, a sailor to the very core in his boyhood, in the schools of his native land, and his mind was in other respects more cultivated than those of most common seamen.

The man on the left, standing behind the officers, is Henry Forges, or Harry, as they always called him, the cook. It is evident from his portrait that he was no beauty. He had suffered, it seems, in previous years from some cutaneous disease, which had finally been cured, but which left indelible traces behind it in the permanent disfigurement of his face. Harry was to serve not only as cook but as general servant, to attend to what on land would be called house-work, and also to aid as seaman in the management of the vessel in case of need.

The vessel was provided for four months, which was the greatest length of absence which it was thought necessary to anticipate—as the time for going and returning, with average weather, would have hardly one month; and while on land the party expected to derive a portion of their subsistence from game. The purpose Mr. Raynal provided himself with a double-barreled fowling-piece, and plenty of ammunition.

When all the preparations for the voyage were completed, Mr. Raynal and Captain Musgrave adopted a precautionary measure, which showed how fully they were aware that the enterprise in which they were about to embark was attended with unusual hazard—as indeed it was—for they were going to explore unfrequented seas, to visit rocky islands, to be exposed to violent and stormy and inclement region. Campbell Island lies in the southern hemisphere, in a latitude nearly corresponding to that of Labrador in the northern. The precaution which they took was this: They arranged with Mr. Sarpy and his partner, that in case they did not return within four months, they were to send out another vessel to search for them. If the firm were not at that time in a condition to fit out such an additional vessel, from their own private resources, they were to make application to the government, stating the facts, and asking that one of the vessels belonging at that station might be sent to look for the missing vessel.

All things being thus arranged, Captain Musgrave went to bid farewell to his wife and children, while Mr. Raynal went on board the Griffon. Captain Musgrave soon afterward joined them, and they set sail.

It was now near the middle of November—a season which, in the southern hemisphere, corresponds with the month of May in ours. For the first week every thing was favorable. The sea was smooth, the wind was fair, and the vessel glided over the water, as Mr. Raynal expressed it in his journal, as if they had been sailing upon a placid lake. On the night of the 13th the attention of the mariners was strongly attracted to the annual display of meteors, which occurs at that season, and which formed for them a most imposing spectacle.

On the 15th a rapid fall of the barometer succeeded a calm. The sea began to rise. They took in all the smaller sails and double reefed the mainsail. The wind soon afterward rose. The waves began to break over upon the deck; and as the plunking of the deck was not very tight, the laboring of the vessel opened the seams, so that the water poured through the streams, and drenched the bedding in the berths.

About midnight, Mr. Raynal was summoned to the deck to relieve the watch, and take his turn at the helm. The night was dark, though there was a phosphorescence in the waves, which seemed, however, not to relieve the darkness, but only to render it visible. Clouds, very low, were driving across the sky, and the wind presented now and then by vivid flashes of lightning, accompanied by terrific peals of thunder. Mr. Raynal took the helm from Alick's hand; but the flashes of lightning were so incessant and so dazzling that he could scarcely see the needle of the compass, illumined by its little lamp, in the binnacle before him. Suddenly he was conscious of a sudden whiteness, like a deluge of water which hurled him from his place at the helm, and carried him across the deck to leeward, where he barely saved himself from being carried overboard by grasping the bulwarks. Some of the bulwarks on the weather side were carried away by the concussion, and the vessel, relieved of the weight herself when the wave passed, remained half reeled over, showing that the ballast had shifted. The men who were below, aroused by the shock and the crash, came rushing to the deck. They immediately made for the mast, which was flapping in the wind with the sound of thunder, and commenced the herculean task of taking it in; while Mr. Raynal, stunned and bewildered by the shock, and with sea-water, tried to make his way back to the helm. It was useless to attempt to bring the vessel up to the wind, when no sail could be carried; so they let her fall off and scud before the gale, which she did, bounding over the waves at a prodigious speed, and lying all the time half over upon her side.

The first work to be done was to right things in the hold, if possible, so as to bring the vessel back to an even keel. Captain Musgrave accordingly took the helm, while Mr. Raynal and the rest, providing themselves with lanterns, went below. There they found every thing in awful confusion. Blocks of stone, casks of water, bags of salt, were mingled pell-mell in the ward, in the angle formed by the flooring already spoken of and the vessel's side. Some were found in the new positions into which they had been thrown, and others, still loose, were thumping back and forth at every plunge of the vessel. To rearrange and secure these things was a very difficult, laborious, and dangerous task; and the men worked at it all the night long.

Fortunately the flooring, which had been laid over the ship's ballast in the lower hold, held firm, and the iron had consequently not been disturbed. Had that floor given way, so as to allow the lower ballast to be thrown out of place, like that which was above the flooring, nothing could have saved the vessel from going down.

Toward morning, having restored something like order in the hold, the men returned to the deck, where they found Captain Musgrave almost exhausted with cold and exposure. His face was red and his hands benumbed, and he was drenched to the skin. He was, however, active and energetic, and showed no signs of discouragement or despondency.

The violence of the storm began now somewhat to abate, and the men were thus given greatly from wet and cold, and every thing above and below was rendered as comfortable as circumstances got no fire. Captain Musgrave did what he could to warm the men by distributing to them a couple of hearty—a resource which, although it consists essentially of borrowing vitality from the future, is, in the high rate of interest in most a present and temporary emergency, is one which, in such cases as this, is thought by seamen to afford the most effectual service.

They sounded the pumps and found, to their great joy, that there was only little leakage, showing that the hull of the vessel had received no serious injury. The wind continued to subside, though it blew by fits with great violence. Before long they succeeded in bringing the vessel around, head to the sea again—a position which is of much greater safety in heavy weather, so long as it can be maintained.

The wind continued to abate until, at length, it subsided to a gentle breeze. The sea went down. The seamen brought the bedding upon the deck, and spread it out to be dried by the sun and air. They rekindled their fire, and began to provide themselves with food in abundance and proper food. In a word, they found themselves restored to their ordinary routine of life, and to the enjoyment of their usual comforts so far as there can be any thing like comfort on board a vessel of eighty tons, sailing in the open sea, and on the confines of the frigid zone.

They went on in this way for several days, until, at length, one day about noon, on coming to the mast-head, Mr. Raynal found that Campbell Island was in sight, at the distance of about thirty-five miles. He cried out, "Land!" a cry which filled his comrades on the deck with excitement and delight. They could, however, there came creeping over the surface of the water a fog which shut out the land from view, and made it unsafe to attempt to approach, on account of the rocky islets and submerged reefs which generally, in the case of such islands, border the shore. So they altered their course and stood out to sea again.

The next morning all was clear; but the land was no longer in sight. They had receded from it so far that it had evidently sunk below the horizon. They soon, however, brought it up again into view, and on the following day reached it in safety, although all the rocks and reefs on the way, and anchored in a harbor which the whalemen, practically visiting the spot, had named Abraham's Bosom.

ROMANCE OF A DONKEY.

JEANNIE LEE AND TOMMY GRAY were little boys and girls together, school-mates, friends, and — But let me first tell of their boyhood.

Their parents were warm friends, so the children had always been together. Tommy, being older, assumed a guardianship over his little playmate which was very pretty to contemplate from a grown-up point of view. He had a pet donkey, and it was his delight to put Jeannie upon Flora's back, and, being walked by her side, holding her hand, that she might not fall. After a while he considered it safe for her to ride behind him at a pillion. This was delightful. Jeannie had a habit of throwing them off every few minutes, which might have been suspicious, except that it afforded Tommy an opportunity to rush to the side of his playmate, and ask earnestly, "Are you hurt, Jeannie dear?" When, Jeannie, with a most laughingly assure him she was unharmed, he would ruefully, but well disappointed, he would now given him so much pleasure to take care of her, and tear up his pocket-handkerchief to bind up the token that the mother's kisses had no doubt, but Jeannie was persistently strong and whole, for a full fleet week, before the next mishap came. One day, when these young people were ten and eleven years of age, they were rambling thought the woods, first one and then the other dropping back, according to that little animal's mood; getting over rather a big piece of ground, the carpet which we always find under pine-trees, made of the dry brown insects which fall and fall and fall, and cover the trunks, and the earth, which the winter-greens and princess pine push their way.

"Jeannie," said Tom, "did you ever see a dead donkey?"

"No, never. I am sure. But what makes you ask me such a funny question, Tom?"

"Why, because I'm afraid Flora may one time that no one ever did see such a thing, because donkeys never died. I'm mighty glad of it, too, for it would make me awfully sorry if Flora should die."

"I should too, Tom. I should cry just as much as if you died! Wouldn't I, Flora dear?" And she threw her arms round the animal's neck.

Flora stood patiently, submitting to the caress, her eyes looking a mild inquiry at her young mistress. Jeannie petted and kissed her, and Tom saw tears in the little girl's eyes.

"Polly, Jeannie, what's the use of crying about it now, specially when you know she can't die? You say you'd feel just as bad if Flora died as you would if I died?"

"Yes, I would, Tom."

"Well, you know there is a great deal more danger of me dying. Why don't you cry about that? When I am old enough I may go to the wars or to sea, and be killed. What would you do then, Jeannie?"

"Oh, Tommy, don't talk that way to me. I don't know what I should do except cry awfully. But I guess I should die too."

"Well, then, why don't you put your arms round me now and cry about it just as you do to the donkey? I don't believe you care half as much for me as you do for Flora."

Jeannie was not too young to feel a little cut about offering to Tom the same caresses which she had lavished upon their pet; but this appeal was too much for her, and throwing her arms about him, she fully atoned for what he had been pleased to regard as neglect. Tom found it necessary to say a great many comforting things, and ripe for mischief as his nature was chief, although it would have pleased him more could he have torn it in strips.

"There now, Jeannie, don't cry any more. Perhaps I won't go to the wars, or to sea either, and perhaps I won't die; but then, of course, I must die some time or other. Maybe, though, you will die first, and that will be better, for you know I will be a man, and stronger than you, and so I can bear it better. Don't you see?"

"Yes, that would be better," said Jeannie. Oh! incipient man and woman! Of course he could bear it better, and be more easily consoled, and of course she could be more hurt in dying than in being left to mourn. Tommy smoothed back her curls and continued, saying:

"Don't you know, Jeannie, you are going to be my little wife when we are grown up?"

"No; I didn't know that. Are you sure?"

"Why, I say so, to be sure. Yes, you are going to be my wife, and we will live in a nice little house, and you'll make tea for me, don't you know; and we'll have Flora, and it will be so nice; and then after a while you'll die, and—"

"Oh, don't talk about that, please; you'll make me cry again."

"Well, I won't; but don't you know when people are going to be married they always give each other something to show they keep their promise? I wish I had a ring to give you, but I haven't got one thing. Oh yes, Jeannie, here's the very thing; we'll each take a lock of Flora's hair and wear it round our necks."

So saying he cut with his knife a lock from between Flora's eyes, divided it, and taking the ribbon from Jeannie's hair he tied the two locks, and putting one round her neck and the other round his first, had she not resisted.

"Well, please, Tommy," she said, in a distressed tone, "you know I haven't made any promise yet; it was only you."

"Oh, well, of course you do promise. You will be my wife, won't you?"

"I don't know," she said, thoughtfully.

"Why don't you know? You'll never love any body else as much as you do me, so of course you'll marry me."

The ribbons were tied without more ado, and giving her a patronizing kiss he walked off home. She was very silent and thoughtful all the way, but he was never more gay and talkative. When they reached her home she bade her good-by, bidding her "never, never, never forget the promise."

"Well, Tommy, I don't know what papa and mamma will say about it."

"Oh, don't be delighted. Don't you worry; and Master Tom walked off whistling, and quite as important and happy as if he had been twenty-one, and his little transaction had been sanctioned by childish.

Poor Jeannie, however, was in a very doubtful state of mind until she had confided to her mother the whole story.

"What shall I do, mamma: can I keep the lock of Flora's hair as long as Tommy keeps his?"

"Yes, dear, you may keep it as long as you like; but I would not talk or think any more about being Tommy's wife, because you are too young to be thinking of such things, and none can know what may happen before you are old enough."

"But, mamma, don't you think he is a good boy? Wouldn't you like to have me be his wife?"

Jeannie asked this in a timid, hesitating way, that showed she did feel interested in the matter; her mamma told her that children playfully spoke to each other of the probability of such a union, resulting from the firm childish affection which had grown up between them, without wishing to keep her little daughter's mind entirely free from all such thoughts, she said:

"You see, Tommy not to talk about it any more, and you be just yourself again—only little Jeannie dear."

A few months after this romantic incident Jeannie was running over to find her playmate one day, when she suddenly came upon him leaning dejectedly against a tree, with tears streaming down his face.

"What is the matter, Tommy? Do tell me, won't you?"

The boy started, and brushing away the tears, he tried to say, carelessly,

"Oh, nothing much, only Flora is gone!" But the last word was a sob, in spite of his efforts to be manly.

"Flora gone! Oh dear, dear! Where has she gone to?"

"I don't know. I've hunted in every place all the morning, but can't find her. She can't be dead, because you know donkeys never die; but that ain't a bit of comfort!" And throwing himself on the ground, he gave up to his tears.

Jeannie felt that her heart was broken by the loss of the pet, and Tommy's grief added another straw to crush her. So, forgetting her mother's advice, she cried:

"Oh, Tommy, please, don't cry so hard; it makes me feel awfully! Now listen to me. You know if I am going to be your little wife you ought to let me comfort you now. Won't you, Tommy?"

This little appeal was made so modestly and earnestly that the boy looked up and allowed himself to be comforted.

Years passed away. The boy and girl were separated. He went to school, and she was taken abroad by her parents to be educated. For a long time letters were exchanged, but gradually they dropped off altogether. At last Jeannie was on her way home. A storm arose, and the vessel was wrecked. Nearly all on board were lost. Jeannie, however, escaped, but her parents were both lost. Her first impulse, on reaching her native land, was to visit the scenes of her childhood. She went back to the old home, and, in spite of the sad changes, it was a pleasure to wander about among the old haunts.

Tommy had been educated because, with the childhood that now, of course, he was brought to her mind very forcibly. Here they had made their little gardens; here they had built a little house of branches, and called it their home; and so on through many childish reminiscences. She wandered on toward the place where he had made pretty much his home, and to her dear joy, now, and if he had forgotten all that. As she drew near the place she was startled to see a man leaning against the very tree, and in his ear was lying the body of a donkey, surely dead. He looked up, hearing her step, and their eyes met.

"Jeannie!"

"Tom!"

That was all they said, but they looked a very lively conversation. At last Tom held out his hand.

"This is poor Flora, Jeannie. Just think of it! I never found her until to-day. Is it not strange you and I should meet here after such a long, long time? In spite of the old tradition, Flora died a natural death. She has wandered back to her old home and died here. Is not that fitting! how much we loved her, didn't we? Jeannie, do you remember the lock of her hair I gave you?"

"Yes, Tom, I do remember it;" and she blushed with the recollection of having hung so near her heart.

"Did you keep it long, Jeannie?"

"Yes, for some time."

"How long?"

"A number of years."

"As many as ten, Jeannie?"

"Why, do you ask, Tom? I dare say you have lost yours long ago."

"You dare say! Look, here it is, proof of my honesty." And he showed her the lock.

He took it from his vest pocket (which is next a man's heart all through the day). It was in a little morocco case, with the gray lock, tied with a faded blue ribbon. Jeannie blushingly took from her neck a little gold locket with a locket suspended, and, opening it, showed Tom the other part of the lock from poor Flora's head. Tom's face was radiant.

"Now, Jeannie, you have kept your promise, and you must keep it still. I've got you, for no locks together in your locket, and I'll put in my little case a curl from your head."

"But, Tom, I haven't kept my promise, you know."

"Ah, yes, but I made it for you, and you have kept it: so you'll be my wife now, of course."

He was the same authoritative individual, determined to have his own way, that he had in days gone by. He had not forgotten how his little playmate confessed him when Flora was gone, and now he exerted himself to comfort the tender girl. It would be impossible for me to put down all he said, but the last time I saw them they were in a pretty little house, and she was making tea for him. But they didn't have old Flora. She has gone to the happy donkey-land, I hope, because I her spirit inhabited another form. At all events, she died!

NEWTON INVESTIGATING LIGHT.

THE picture on our first page tells us in a graphic way an interesting historical fact. The Rev. J. A. HOUSTON, of the Royal Scottish Academy, represents one of the early experiments with the prism, one of the most important and beautiful discoveries in regard to the nature of light, which formed the ground-work for subsequent researches in optical science. Marvelous progress has been made since his time. The wonderful phenomena of the polarization of light, its chemical and actinic properties, the theory of its undulatory transmission are manifestations which have been investigated with surprising sagacity and patience. While FARADAY and others have brought the inquiry into the affinities of light, heat, electricity, magnetism, and galvanism to the very threshold, as it would seem, of a universal and grand system of the physical forces, the most interesting verification in photography, as not which has illustrated the latent forces evolved to its own disadvantage—the very different activity or actinic power of rays of different colors.

The data for NEWTON's conclusions respecting the composite nature of light were founded, as we all know, upon a simple experiment with a prism—an experiment which a child might have made; and not more likely to lead to a great discovery, unless reasoned upon by a philosopher, than was the fall of an apple likely to suggest the great law of gravitation which sustains and regulates the universe.

The manner in which NEWTON made his early experiments is shown in the picture. "I shall consider and effective picture. The shutter of a room are closed on a sunshiny day, but a single beam is admitted through a small orifice; a prism of glass is placed in this beam, and the light passing through it is decomposed or detached into its constituents as it falls on any object within the room, because it is seen that the beam is composed of rays of different degrees of refrangibility, according to the colors into which they resolve themselves. We need only add that the artist has indicated some of the other principal instruments and labors of our great philosopher by the telescope, books, and so forth, introduced in the back-ground of the picture.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

VERY simple and unpretending was the funeral of the great novelist, Charles Dickens. Early in the morning of June 14 the remains were conveyed from his residence at Gad's Hill to Westminster Abbey. Three plain coaches followed the hearse, containing the mourning family. The body of Dickens was interred in the Poet's Corner, near to Addison, Macaulay, Mendelssohn, and Cumberland. Dean Stanley read the burial-service. During the day thousands who had known and loved the gifted man, chiefly through his writings, crowded to the Abbey to look upon the resting-place of his dust, and to cover the grave with fragrant flowers. Some time before his death Mr. Dickens had selected to be buried in an old cemetery near Rochester. It is reported that this burial-place has since been closed. Indeed, it seems fitting that the remains of one who, though his works, belongs in no pre-eminently to the literary public, should rest in the sepulchre of fame among the renowned dead. Yet there is something both touching and pleasing in the fact that the grave of Dickens is situated in the rural service of Charles Dickens. Upon the coffin-plate were inscribed the simple words:

CHARLES DICKENS,
Born February 7, 1812.
Died June 9, 1870.

Some months ago it was accidentally discovered by a French workman that varnish was an excellent medium for engraving, and since then some remarkable cures have been performed by its instrumentality. Recently, also, the same discovery has been proved in an excellent pain-relieving application, and it is recommended for horse and rabbit. Many experiments have shown that crude oil is better than the distilled article, that the heaviest oil is to be preferred, and that the refuse of the oil, which has no lubricating (such as is used for lubricating purposes), is the best of all.

Professor Seeley, author of "Ecce Homo," has just completed a course of lectures to women on Roman History, at the Philosophical Institution of Kensington. There were two hundred in the class. The lecture-rooms at Cambridge University have been thrown open to women. A short time ago the first examinations ever opened to women in Ireland were passed by twelve candidates at Trinity College, Dublin. The Dutch are alarmed at a decree of the government, which forbids the sale of gunpowder by apothecaries to women. The Russian government has opened the doors of medical schools to women, and a commissioner has been sent from France to England for the purpose of investigating this "movement." So the work goes on.

"Spotted Tail," one of the most powerful of the Indian Chiefs, does not seem to be intimidated, although the Government contract exiled him at the head of a man's power. He thus expresses his views to an intercepted letter: "Some white men in the south of this sea. His hate are like the trees of the forest. His horses are iron. Their speed is lightning. He has a path wire that goes over the great country. It reaches a hundred nations. He blows through the wire. The white men hear the great blower. The wire is a mouth go to the ends of the earth. They call up warriors and send answer to the south. But the soul of Spotted Tail knows no fear." How the letter was intercepted, we know not; but "Spotted Tail" writes very well!

The Ohio Legislature has just enacted a very stringent law against the sale of dangerous kerosene. The standard is 110° Fahr. For the Brooklyn Fire Dept. and the sale of an oil which flashes below this temperature is prohibited. In case a death ensues from oil flashing below 110° Fahr., the seller is to be punished for manslaughter.

Physician's fees in Prussia are regulated by law, and are fixed upon a very reasonable basis. For a first visit within the city limits a physician is allowed to charge from 12 to 20 silbergroschen (equivalent to 25 to 50 cents. If at a distance of from one to five miles, he receives a charge for the first visit easy to from 75 cents to $1 50, and subsequent ones from 50 to 75 cents. For a first visit at night he may charge, in town, from $1 50 to $2 25; if more than a mile out of town, from $2 25 to $3; following night-visits between $1 50 and $2 25 in town, and $3 in the country, from $1 12 to $2 25. He may not charge for more than two visits a day unless for special request, and he must his fees for all attendance on any one patient during a month in no case exceed $8 25. The scale of fee in the list is awarded to the surgeon who performs lithotomy—namely, from $18 to $37 50.

Autobiographies are the fashion just now. Rossini has written his memoirs. He has given the history of the commencement of his, and Dieraeli is said to have his hand lovingly with the continuation.—VICTOR HUGO has $37,000 from his publications last year, but spent more than twice that amount in which he was to establish the Rappel newspaper in Paris.—The King of Saxony, who is a scholar as well as a king, has just begun to learn Polish and Russian languages. He wishes to translate into German some of the gems of Scandinavian literature.

A Parisian banker invented an ingenious plan to prevent defalcation by his cashier. He placed on iron cage before his safe and announced that the cashier should be locked in it until his cash account was verified at the close of the day. He could find only one man willing to accept this condition. "You must enter the cage at 4 o'clock, and you will be released at 5, after your account has been verified," said the banker to the applicant. "Agreed." "You must not leave the cage," said the banker. "Agreed; I'll keep the key in my pocket." "All right. I am used to being locked up. I have been in prison for 12 in the penitentiary during these last fifteen years."

The selection of Mr. Nathaniel Jarvis to fill the vacancy in the Board of Education caused by the late retirement of Judge Richard Larremore appears to give general satisfaction to the friends of education in this city. He is a gentleman of experience and capacity, and in all matters appertaining to practical school wants his action will doubtless be judicious. Mr. Bernard Smyths, who succeeds Judge Larremore as President of the Board, brings to this position a thorough knowledge of educational matters, gained which may be taken as a guarantee that the interests of education will not suffer under his regime.

Jerome Napoleon Bonaparte, eldest son of the Emperor Napoleon's brother Jerome, died in Washington, on June 17, from cancer in the throat. In 1803 Prince Jerome Bonaparte visited the United States, and in Baltimore he met Miss Elizabeth Patterson, a young lady of uncommon beauty and accomplishments. On Christmas-eve of the same year, having overcome the opposition of her father, he married her. Prince Jerome took his beautiful bride to Europe after a year or two; but France was closed to her by the order of the Emperor Napoleon, who also ordered Jerome to go at once to Paris. He went, but did not return to his wife. Napoleon refused to recognize the marriage, and in 1807 Jerome was married to the daughter of the King of Wurtemburg. In 1805 Mrs. Patterson Bonaparte, while in England, gave birth to Jerome Napoleon, who has just died. The mother took every means in her power to secure to her child what she deemed his rights. He was allowed to visit France, and there remained with his father, though he was not called one of the royal family, and no coolness at first with his mother was exhibited. Jerome was educated at Harvard College, and entered the legal profession. He was married in early life to Miss Williams, daughter of Benjamin Williams, of Roxbury, Massachusetts. He leaves a son, Jerome Napoleon, who graduated at West Point, and is now an officer in the French army. Madame Bonaparte, at the age of ninety-five years, both husband and son dead, it is said that she has predicted that she will live to see her grandson Emperor of the French.

Some adventurous investigator has made a visit to the lowest depths of the caisson of the East River Bridge, and don't like the amusement much. He says that he thinks he would gladly himself fail as well in the groves of Prospect Park!

When the Prince of Wales was returning from the Epsom Derby, the other day, a bevy of ladies mounted on the Queen's road to meet him and join in the party. The Prince was smoking a cigar, but instantly threw it away, and lost no return the salutation. Fortunately (for the ladies) in so doing he dropped his whip, which was picked up by one of the party, who stoop for such a trifle, and a general rush was made for the whip. The Prince looked on in a fine humor at the scramble of the ladies to become the owner of the glove, and the carriage proceeded on its way.

The story of "Edwin Drood" was commenced by Mr. Dickens in the April No. of All the Year Round. It is Wednesday, June 7, two days before his death.

From English journals we learn that the committee appointed by the Convocation of Canterbury to set the authorized version of the Bible has held its first meeting, and agreed upon its plan of operation. The committee is to confine itself to the consideration of the error for revision of the Old Testament, and the other for that of the New. It has also determined that it would be of its authority to invite the co-operation of any persons eminent for their knowledge of Hebrew or of any religious body they may belong. As a general principle it is to make as few alterations as may, it has been resolved to introduce as few alterations as possible into the text of the authorized version consistently with faithfulness, and to limit, as far as possible, the expression of such alterations to the language of the authorized version. The Bishop of Gloucester, in proposing to make two revisions of its text, the one provisional, and the other final. In the former, proposed changes in the text will be made on the approval of a majority of three-fourths; in the change will be reserved, as the final revision which is not considered by a majority of two-thirds. Whenever the text adopted by the committee differs from the authorized version, the attention is to be indicated in the margin. The changes are to be limited to the alteration of words, paragraphs, italics, and punctuation, and application is to be made to the Convocation for the permission to enable, to dilosse, scholars, and literary men, at home and abroad, for their opinions.

People are becoming anxious about the sun. The spots on its surface, which have long interested scientific men, and now grown so large that, apparently, they might easily swallow up our small earth. These spots are supposed to indicate some great convulsion or catastrophe which will ruin us. It is believed by many scientific men that the sun's enormous heat in the sun causes peculiar magnetic influences upon our earth.

TENNYSON has volunteered to assist in observations upon the total eclipse of the sun which occurs next December, and which is visible in Europe. But he will not have to assist in any unknown. It may be we shall have as the result a word-painting, describing the eclipse in the poet's own language.

It is about three years since Mlle. Christine Nilsson first sang before an English audience, her debut having been made as Violetta in "La Traviata," at Her Majesty's Theatre, on May 4, 1867. On that night she achieved a perfect success, and her career has since been one of continued triumph.

An American traveler, with that enterprise which is a national characteristic, has made a proposal to the Italian government to lease Mount Vesuvius. He thinks he can make a good thing of it by lighting out roads and pleasure-grounds, building hotels, and setting up soda fountains on its summit. Moreover, he proposes to take visitors up and down by machinery. Those who want to see the show must pay a small admission fee.

CHAPTER THE FIFTIETH.

THE MORNING.

WHEN does the vain regret find its keenest sting? When is the doubtful future blackened by its darkest cloud? When is life least worth having, and death softest of the beholder? At the terrible morning hours, when the sun is rising in its glory, and the birds are singing in the stillness of the new-born day.

Anne woke in the strange bed, and looked round her, by the light of the new morning, at the strange room.

The rain had all fallen in the night. The sun was master in the clear autumn sky. She rose, and opened the window. The fresh morning air, keen and fragrant, filled the room. Far and near, the same bright stillness possessed the view. She stood at the window looking out. Her mind was clear again—she could think, she could feel; she could face the one last question which the merciless morning now forced on her —How will it end?

Was there any hope?—hope, for instance, in what she might do for herself. What can a married woman do for herself? She can make her misery public—provided it be proved to a certain kind—and can reckon single-handed with Society when she has done it. Nothing more.

Was there, in what others might do for her? Blanche might write to her—might even come and see her—if her husband allowed it; and that was all. Sir Patrick had pressed her hand at parting, and had told her to rely on him. He was the firmest, the truest of friends. But what could he do? There were outrages which her husband was privileged to commit under the sanction of marriage, at the bare thought of which her blood ran cold. Could Sir Patrick protect her? Could the Law and Society arrand her husband with his conjugal rights. Law and Society had given me never to give, if she appealed to them—You are his wife.

No hope in herself; no hope in her friends; no hope any where on earth. Nothing to be done but to wait for the end—with faith in the Divine Mercy—with faith in the Saviour who died.

She took out of her trunk a little book of Prayers and Meditations—worn with much use —which had once belonged to her mother. She read her the window reading it. She read there she looked at the view—thinking. The parallel between her mother's position and her own position was now complete. Both married to husbands who loved them; to husbands whose interests pointed to mercenary alliances with other women; to husbands whose one want and one purpose was to be free from their wives. Strange, what different ways had led mother and daughter both to the same fate! Would the parallel hold to the end? "Shall I die," she wondered, thinking of her mother's last moments, "in Blanche's arms?"

The time had passed unheeded. The morning movement in the house had failed to catch her ear. She was first called out of herself by the sense of the present and passing events, by the voice of the servant girl outside the door.

"The master wants you, ma'am, directly."

She rose instantly, and put away the little book.

"Is that all the message?" she asked, opening the door.

"Yes, ma'am."

She followed the girl down stairs; recalling to her memory the strange words addressed to her by Geoffrey, in the presence of the servants, on the evening before. Was she now to know what those words meant? The time could not have soon be set at rest. "Be the trial what it may," she thought to herself, "let me bear it as my brother would have borne it."

The servant opened the door of the dining-room. Breakfast was on the table. Geoffrey was standing at the window. Hester Detbridge was waiting, seated near the door. He came forward—with the meanest approach to gentleness in his manner which she had ever yet seen in him—he came forward, with a set smile on his lips, and offered her his hand!

She had entered the room, prepared (as she believed) for any thing that could happen. She was not prepared for this. She stood speechless, looking at him.

Before she could recover—in a voice that was not like his own; with a furtive restraint in his manner which she had never noticed in it before.

"Won't you shake hands with your husband?" he asked, "when your husband asks you?"

She mechanically put her hand in his. He dropped it instantly, with a start. "God! how cold!" he exclaimed. His own hand was burning hot, and shook incessantly.

He pointed to a chair at the head of the table. "Will you make the tea?" he asked.

She had given him her hand mechanically; she advanced a step mechanically—and then stopped.

"Would you prefer breakfasting by yourself?" he said.

"If you please," she answered, faintly.

"Wait a minute. I have something to say before you go."

She waited. He considered with himself; consulting his memory—visibly, unmistakably, consulting it before he spoke again.

"I have had the night to think in," he said. "The night has made a new man of me. I beg your pardon for what I said yesterday. I was not myself yesterday. I talked nonsense yesterday. Please to forget it, and forgive it. I wish to turn over a new leaf, and make amends—make amends for my past conduct. It shall be my endeavor to be a good husband. In the presence of Mrs. Detbridge, I request you to give me a chance. I will force your inclinations. We are married—what's the use of regretting it? Let us begin as we ought yesterday, on your own terms. I wish to make it up. In the presence of Mrs. Detbridge, I say I wish to make it up. I wish to detain you. I request you to think of it. Good-morning."

He said those extraordinary words like a slow boy saying a hard lesson—his eyes on the ground, his fingers restlessly fastening and unfastening a button on his waistcoat.

Anne left the room. In the passage she was obliged to wait, and regain herself under the walk. His unnatural politeness was horrible; his carefully asserted repentance chilled her to the heart. Her husband had never left her at the time of his fiercest anger and his foulest language—the unutterable horror of him that she felt now.

Hester Detbridge came out, closing the door behind her. "Mr. Geoffrey has sent me," Anne heard her say, in a low tone, and held it out, with these words on it:

"Do you believe him?"

Anne pushed the slate away, and ran up stairs.

She locked the door of her room, and said to herself, "He is plotting something against me," she said to herself. "What?"

A sickening, physical sense of dread—entirely new in her experience of herself—made her shrink from answering the question. She stalking at her heart turned her faint. She went to get the air at the open window.

After some moments there was a ring at the gate bell. Suspicious of any thing and every thing, she felt a sudden impulse to look from itself be seen. she drew back behind the curtain and looked out.

A man servant, in livery, was let in. He had a letter in his hand. He said to the girl as he passed through the door, "For Mrs. Holchester; I must see Mr. Delamayn instantly."

They went in. There was an interval. The footman reappeared, leaving the door open. There was another interval. Then there came a knock at the door. Anne hesitated. The knock was repeated, and the dumb murmuring of Hester Detbridge was heard outside. Anne opened the door.

Hester came in with the breakfast. She pointed to a let or among other things on the tray. It was addressed to Anne, in Geoffrey's handwriting, and it contained these words:

"My brother has gone to Scotland. They ordders for your mo'ning. The boy will take them. You are not to trouble yourself to go to London. Geoffrey is to come down to you from the shop."

Anne dropped the paper on her lip without looking up. At the same moment Hester Detbridge's slate was passed stealthily between her eyes and the note—with these words pencilled on it. "His mother is coming to-day. His brother has been brought from Scotland. He was drunk last night. He's drinking again. I know what that means. Look out, missus—look out."

Anne looked to her to know the sense. She went out, pulling the door to, but not closing it behind her.

There was another ring at the gate bell. Once more Anne went to the window. Only the lad, this time, arriving to take his order for the day. He had barely entered the garden when he was followed by the postman with letters. In a minute more Geoffrey's voice was heard in the passage, and Geoffrey's heavy step ascended the stairs. Anne waited for the handwriting on the room to draw the bolts. Geoffrey met her before she could close the door.

"A letter for you," he said, keeping scrupulously out of the room. "I don't wish to force your inclinations—I only request you to tell me who it's from."

His manner was as carefully subdued as ever. But the unacknowledged distrust in him (when he looked at her) betrayed itself in his eye.

She glanced at the handwriting on the address. "From Blanche," she answered.

He softly put his foot between the door and the post—and waited until she had perused and read Blanche's letter.

"May I ask?" he asked—and put in his hand for it through the door.

The spirit in Anne which would once have resisted him rose indeed in her now. She handed him the open letter.

It was very short. Excepting some brief expressions of fondness, it was studiously confined to stating the purpose for which it had been written. Blanche proposed to visit Anne that afternoon, accompanied by her uncle: she sent word beforehand, to make sure of finding Anne at home. That was all. The letter had evidently been written under Sir Patrick's advice.

Geoffrey handed it back, after first waiting a moment to think.

"My father died yesterday," he said. "My wife can't receive visitors before he is buried. I don't wish to force your inclinations. I only say I can't let visitors in here before the funeral—except my own family. Send a note down stairs. Perhaps I will take it to your friend when he goes to London." With those words, he left her.

An appeal to the proprieties of life, in the mouth of Geoffrey Delamayn, could only mean that he had things. Either he had spoken in brutal mockery—or he had spoken with some ulterior object in view. Had he seized on the event of his father's death as a pretext for isolating his wife from all communication with the outer world? We shore reasons, which had not yet asserted themselves, for his dreading the result, if he allowed Anne to communicate with Blanche.

The hour wore on, and Hester Detbridge appeared again. The lad was waiting for Anne's orders for her mourning, and for her note to Mrs. Arnold Brinkworth.

Anne wrote the note and the note. Once more the horrible slate appeared when she had finished writing. Geoffrey paper and her eye, with the hard lines of warning pitilessly traced on it. "He has locked the gate. When there's a ring we are to come in by the key. He has written to a woman. Name outside the letter. Mrs. Glenarm. He has had more brandy. Like my husband. Mind yourself."

The one way out of the high walls all round the garden was closed. Friends forbidden to see her. Solitary imprisonment, with her husband for a jailer. Nothing else had been four-and-twenty hours in the cottage it had come to that. And what was to follow?

She turned round mechanically to the window. The sight of the outer world, the occasional view of a passing vehicle, helped to sustain her.

The lad appeared in the front garden departing to perform his errand to London. Geoffrey followed him, opened the gate, and called after him, as he passed through it, "Don't forget the books!"

The "books?" What "books?" Who wanted them? The slightest thing now roused Anne's suspicion. In two hours afterward the books haunted her mind.

He secured the gate and came back again. He stopped under Anne's window and called to her. She showed herself. "When you want to eat and drink," he said, "ring the bell under your own disposal." He put the key of the gate in his pocket and returned to the house.

After some moments more he decided on taking him at his word. In the state of suspense, to remain within the four walls of the house was unendurable. If some lurking snare lay hid under the far-sounding proposal which Geoffrey had made, he was less repellent to her bolder to prove what it might be than to wait pondering over it in the solitude of her dark. She put on her hat and went down into the garden.

Nothing happened out of the common. Where-ever he was in the house, he showed himself. She wandered up and down, keeping on the side of the garden which was farthest from the dining-room window. To a woman, escape from the place was simply impossible. Setting out of the question the height of the walls, they were armed at the top with a thick setting of jagged broken glass. A small back-door in the end wall (untended probably by the gardener's use) was bolted and locked—the key having been taken out. There was no way out, but by the hands of the local growers of vegetables surrounded the garden on all sides. In the nineteenth century, and in the populous neighborhood of a great metropolis, Anne was as absolutely isolated from all contact with the humanity around her as if she lay in her grave.

After the lapse of half an hour the silence was broken by the sound of wheels on the road—the public road in front, and a ring at the bell. Anne kept close out of sight on the back; determined, if a chance offered, on speaking to the visitor, whoever the visitor might be.

She heard in the dining-room through the open window—Geoffrey's voice and the voice of a woman. "I am Mrs. Glenarm," she said. "Mrs. Glenarm, surely? After a while the visitor's voice was suddenly raised. "Where is she?" it said. "I must see her." Anne instantly advanced to the back-door of the house—and found herself face to face with a lady who was a total stranger to her.

"Are you my son's wife?" asked the lady.

"I am your son's prisoner," Anne answered.

Lady Holchester's pale face turned paler still. It was plain that Anne's reply had confirmed some doubt in the visitor's mind which had been already suggested to it by the son.

"What do you mean?" she asked, in a whisper.

Geoffrey's heavy footsteps crossed the dining-room. There was no time to explain. Anne whispered back.

"Tell my friends what I have told you."

Geoffrey appeared at the dining-room door.

"Name one of your friends," said Lady Holchester.

"Sir Patrick Lundie."

Geoffrey heard the answer. "What about Sir Patrick Lundie?" he asked.

"I wish to see Sir Patrick Lundie," said his mother. "I suppose your wife can tell me where to find him."

Anne instantly understood that Lady Holchester would communicate with Sir Patrick. She mentioned his London address. Lady Holchester turned to leave the cottage. Her son stopped her.

"Let us set things straight," he said, "before you go. My mother," he went on, addressing himself to Anne, "don't think there's much chance for us two of living comfortably together. Bear witness to the truth—will you? What did I tell you at breakfast-time? Didn't I say it should be my endeavor to make you a good husband? Didn't I say—in Mrs. Detbridge's presence—that I wished to force your inclinations—except my own family. Send a note down stairs. Perhaps I will take it to your friend when he goes to London." With those words, he left her.

He waited to be questioned by his mother. She asked no questions. Her face was pale, her manner was constrained. She waited, as if she expected him to say more.

He said no more. He waited, as if he expected his mother to say more.

Lady Holchester broke the silence. "Is there any thing else?" she asked.

"Nothing else," he answered.

She left the room. He followed her out, and closed the door behind her.

Anne was left alone with Hester Detbridge.

The lad appeared in the front garden departing to perform his errand to London. Geoffrey followed him, opened the gate, and called after him, as he passed through it, "Don't forget the books!"

The "books?" What "books?" Who wanted them? The slightest thing now roused Anne's suspicion. In two hours afterward the books haunted her mind.

He secured the gate and came back again. He stopped under Anne's window and called to her. She showed herself. "When you want to eat and drink," he said, "ring the bell under your own disposal." He put the key of the gate in his pocket and returned to the house.

After some moments more she decided on taking him at his word. In the state of suspense, to remain within the four walls of the house was unendurable. If some lurking snare lay hid under the far-sounding proposal which Geoffrey had made, she was less repellent to her bolder to prove what it might be than to wait pondering over it in the solitude of her dark. She put on her hat and went down into the garden.

Nothing happened out of the common. Wher

"Your brother's generous offer deserves a better answer than that," she said.

"My answer," reiterated Geoffrey, "is—No!"

He sat between them with his clenched fists resting on his knees—absolutely impenetrable to any thing that either of them could say.

"In your situation," said Julius, "a refusal is sheer madness. I won't accept it.

"Do as you like about that. My mind's made up. I won't let my wife be taken away from me. Here she stays."

The brutal tone in which he had made that reply roused Lady Holchester's indignation.

"Take care!" she said. "You are not only behaving with the grossest ingratitude to your brother—you are forcing a suspicion into your mother's mind. You have some motive that you are hiding from us."

He turned on his mother with a sudden ferocity which made Julius spring to his feet. The next instant his eyes were on the ground, and the devil that possessed him was quiet again.

"Some motive I'm hiding from you?" he repeated, with his head down, and his utterance thicker than ever. "I'm ready to have my private pocket all over London, if you like. I'm fond of her."

He looked up as he said the last words. Lady Holchester turned away her head—receiving from her own son. So overwhelming was the shock inflicted on her that even the strongly rooted prejudice which Mrs. Glenarm had implanted in her mind yielded to it. "Is your settlement she absolutely pitied Anne!

"Poor creature!" said Lady Holchester.

He took instant offense at those two words. "I won't have my wife pitied by any body."

With that reply, he dashed into the passage and called out, "Anne! come down!"

Her soft voice answered; her light footfall was heard on the stairs. She came into the room. Julius advanced, took her hand, and held it with him. "We are having a family discussion," he said, trying to give her confidence.

"And Geoffrey is getting hot over it, as usual."

Geoffrey appealed sternly to his mother.

"Look at her!" he said. "Is she worried? Is she in rags? Is she covered with bruises?" He turned to Anne. "They have come here to propose a separation. They both hate me—I hate you. I don't hate you. I'm a good Christian. I owe it to you that I'm cut out of my father's will. I forgive you that. I owe it to you that I've lost the chance of marrying a woman with ten thousand a year. I forgive you that. Im, not a man who does things by halves. I said it should be my endeavor to make you a good husband, and it was my wish to make it up. Well! I am as good as my word. And what's the consequence? I am insulted by my mother comes here, and my brother comes here —and they offer me money to part from you. Money by Jove! I'll be ticketed if I understand. I'll get my own living. Shame on the people who involve between man and wife! Shame—that's what I say—shame!"

Anne looked, for an explanation, from her husband to her husband's mother.

"Have you proposed a separation between us?" she asked.

"Very terms of the utmost advantage to my son; arranged with every possible consideration toward you. Is there any objection to your side?"

"Oh, Lady Holchester! is it possible to ask me? Who does he say?"

"He has refused."

"Refused!"

"Yes," said Geoffrey. "I don't go back from my word; I stick to what I said this morning. It's my manner to make you a good husband. It's my wish to make it up." He paused, and then added in his former tone: "I love her."

Their eyes met as he said it to her. Julius felt Anne's hand suddenly tighten round his. The desperate grasp of the frail little fingers, the imploring terror in the gentle sensitive face as it slowly turned him to plead, said to him all of me.

"Don't have me friendless to-night!"

"If you both stop here till domesday," said Geoffrey, "you'll get nothing else out of me. You have had my reply."

With that, he seated himself doggedly in a corner of the room, waiting—ostentatiously waiting—for his mother and his brother to take their leave. The position was absurd. To argue the matter with him that night was hopeless. To invite Sir Patrick's interference was only be to provoke his savage temper to a new outbreak. On the other hand, to leave the helpless woman, after what had passed, without one other effort to befriend her, was, in her situation, an act of downright inhumanity, and nothing less. Julius took the one way out of the difficulty that was left—the one way worthy of him as a gentleman and an honorable man.

"We will drop it for to-night, Geoffrey," he said. "But I am not the less resolved, in spite of all that you have said, to return to the subject to-morrow. It would save me some inconvenience—a second journey here from town—if when going back again to my engagements—if I said with you to-night. Can you give me a bed?"

A look flashed on him from Anne, which thanked him as no words could have thanked him.

"Give you a bed?" repeated Geoffrey. He checked himself, on the point of refusing. His mother was watching him: his wife was watching him—and his wife knew that the room above them was a room to spare. "All right!" he resumed, in another tone, with his eye on his mother. "There's an empty room up stairs. Have it, if you like. You won't find I've changed my mind to-morrow—but that's your look out. Stop here, if the fancy takes you. I've no objection. It don't matter to Me.—Will you trust his lordship under my roof?" he added, addressing his wife suddenly. "I might have some motive that I'm hiding from you, you know!" Without waiting for an answer, he turned to Anne. "Go and tell old Dummy to put the sheets on the bed. Say there's a live lord in the house—she's to send in something devilish good for dinner!"

He burst fiercely into a forced laugh. Lady Holchester rose at the moment when Anne was leaving the room.

"I shall not be here when you return," she said, "and I wish you good-night."

She shook hands with Anne—giving her Sir Patrick's note, unseen, at the same moment. Julius followed her to the door, and received from her word to her second son, Lady Holchester beckoned to him to give her his arm. "You have acted nobly toward your brother," she said to him. "My one comfort and my one hope, Julius, is in you." They went out together in the gate, Geoffrey following them with the key in his hand. "Don't be too anxious," he said to Julius, ironically. "I will keep the drink out of his way to-night—and I will bring you a better account of him to-morrow. Explain every thing to Sir Patrick as you go home." He handed Lady Holchester into the carriage; and then, leaning carelessly on the door, he grew.

The brothers returned in silence to the cottage. Julius had expected it from his mother —but he was seriously uneasy in secret. Naturally prone to look at all things on their brightest side, he could find no other explanation for on what Geoffrey had said and done that night. His own views, in the future disposition of Anne's part, in his present relations with his wife, for some abominable purpose of his own, had rooted itself firmly in Geoffrey's mind. Out of the experience of his brother, the pecuniary considerations were not the uppermost consideration in Geoffrey's mind.

They went back into the drawing-room.

"What will you have to drink?" said Geoffrey.

"Nothing."

"You won't keep me company over a drop of brandy-and-water?"

"No. You have had enough brandy-and-water."

After a moment of frowning self consideration in the glass, Geoffrey abruptly agreed with Julius. "I look like it," he said. "I'll soon put myself right." He disappeared, and returned with a wet towel tied round his head. "What will you do while the women are getting your bed ready? Have my library key, if you like to smoke, and make myself—In a reformed character, you know, now I'm a married man. You do what you like. I shall read."

He turned to the side-table; and, producing a new volume of the Newgate Calendar, sat down to his brother. Julius handed it back again.

"You won't misunderstand me," he said, "with such a book as that. Vile actions, recorded in vile English, make vile reading, Geoffrey, in every sense of the word."

"It will do for me. I don't know good English when I see it."

With that acknowledgment—to which the great majority of his companions at school and college would have subscribed without doing the slightest injustice to the present state of English education—Geoffrey drew his chair to the table, and opened the new volumes of his second of crime.

The present newspaper was lying on the sofa. Julius took it up, and seated himself opposite to his brother. He noticed, with some surprise, that Geoffrey appeared to have a special object in consulting his book. Instead of beginning at the first page, he turned over many leaves in his ages, and turned them down at certain places, before he entered on his reading. If Julius had looked over his brother's shoulder, instead of only looking at him across the table, he would have seen that Geoffrey drew his chair nearer to the volumes reported in the Calendar, and marked for his own private reading the cases of murder only.

BASE-BALL.

THE New York admirers of this most manly and healthful of all out-door games were treated last week to the finest sport ever witnessed in this country. The great match game played between the "Red Stockings," of Cincinnati, and several of our own most celebrated clubs. The "Red Stockings" came here with a reputation of little less than invincibility. They had not been defeated for two years. Their practice had also been splendid, their training excellent, and their confidence well grounded on a long series of triumphs over our best players.

The first game took place on the Union grounds with the "Atlantics," on the Capitoline grounds, on Long Island. From twelve to fifteen thousand people passed into the inclosure to witness the sport; and we are sorry to say that the crowd was boisterous and noisy, and greatly marred the pleasure of the game for those who wished to look on quietly. The "Red Stockings" were not treated with the courtesy they had hitherto received, and for the first, and we trust, the last time, partisan feeling was allowed to disturb good order. Cincinnati played and to interfere with fair play. The "Red Stockings" conducted themselves like gentlemen and played from first to last with pluck and spirit. But the Fates and the crowd were against them; and, after one of the most exciting contests on record, the victory which seer.ed to be within their grasp was wrested from them, and they retired from the field defeated, but without disgrace. The "Atlantics" played with great skill and precision, and there is no reason to suppose that they lent any countenance to the partisan proceedings of the spectators. The following is the score of this remarkable game:

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11

On the day after their defeat the "Red Stockings" played the "Unions," at Tremont, a very strong and well trained club, on whom they inflicted a Waterloo defeat, the score standing:

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9

The "Red Stockings" followed up this victory by a defeat of the "Resolutes," of Elizabeth, in a very hard-contested game, the close of which the score stood:

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Resolutes	1	3	0	0	1	0	1	0	1	7
Red Stockings	1	0	0	1	0	1	0	1	0	4

The fifth game was played June 17 with the "Eckfords," at the Union grounds. On neither side was the play very brilliant, and the "Red Stockings" won easily as follows:

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Eckfords	0	0	0	1	0	1	1	1	0	4

On June 18 the "Red Stockings" played with the "Star," at Hoboken, and, although the play was noticeably fine and plucky. The score was as follows:

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Stars	0	0	0	4	0	1	0	6	0	11

Notwithstanding their defeat by the "Atlantics," the "Red Stockings" return from their Eastern tour with undiminished laurels, and leaving behind them the impression that, in the whole land, there is no match for any club in the country. Our artist has given a spirited sketch of this contest, which must always be memorable in the annals of both clubs.

THE JEROME PARK RACES.

THE close of the Spring Meeting at Jerome Park took place on Wednesday, June 15. The most brilliant day of the day was that for the Hunter's Plate, which derived especial interest from the fact that the noble animals concerned were ridden by members of the Club. It was a handicap of all ages, two miles, and the following were the entries: "Neptune" was ridden by Mr. Berkeford, "Pontoon" by Mr. Pryer, "Edmund" by Captain Cresswell, "Lightning" by Mr. Elwes, and "Viley" by Mr. Hecksher. After one false start they got off nicely together, and after a very close contest Captain Cresswell came in winner by half a length. The day was splendid, and the attendance was very large. Among the spectators in the public stand were Rev. Cloud, Rev. Dod, Bishop Beam, Black Hawk, and half a dozen squaws. They did not appear to be greatly interested in the various events, and either dozed or fanned themselves during the whole time. Every attracted much attention, of course, and were considerably annoyed by the crowd that pressed in upon them from every side.

A CHINESE DINNER-PARTY.

THERE are plenty of eating-houses of every description in every Chinese town and village, suitable to rich or poor, and abundance of inns and road-side stalls where a good meal may be had for man or beast. Rice and noodles are not generally used, as the cook serves every thing up with oil, and the Chinaman eats with his chopsticks, with which he contrives to shovel an astonishing amount of food down and into his mouth by holding the dish nearly close to the lips. All Chinamen like good living, whether rich or poor, and he who can afford it keep most luxurious tables, and entertain very liberally. The dinners are conducted with some ceremony by the fashionable classes; the invitations are written on the finest paper, silk, or satin of bright color, the rank and titles of the guests being punctiliously set forth; and the same etiquette is observed as to the order of precedence at table on the right and left of the entertainer, who can then offer them personally some of the choicest of the dishes. Sometimes the dinner is served with small square tables to each guest; at other times at one large round table, and the dinner is à la Russe, as we should say, the table being ornamented with porcelain vases filled with flowers, sweet-meats, fruit, and pickles and other ornamental objects. When the host wishes to show any mark of especial favor, he cuts off the choice bits he can from the best dishes with his chopsticks, and places them on his friend's plate. In order to further the good endeavors to show his full relish of the good things laid before him by belching after each fresh dish is served.

A small cup of the finest tea is always the first thing served, and the tea cup with a plate and chopsticks is placed before each person, when the servants, who are plainly dressed, bring the first course of shark's-fin soup, stewed sea-slugs (birds de mer), preserved eggs boiled hard and sliced, dried fish, meat cooked in various succulent ways, and stewed ducks. Many varieties of cookery follow, and sometimes, though rarely, the dinner is brought to a close with a dish of Tartar soup of the Java or Sumatra swallow, the costliness of this luxury placing it beyond the reach of any but the wealthy. It is, as most people know, the nest found in the cliffs and rocks, and besides the great difficulty and danger of procuring them, as the samphire-gatherer pursues his perilous trade, they require an immense amount of careful preparation to render them fit for cooking. Sweetmeats of every kind, ginger, almonds, oranges, lichees, grapes, apples, guavas, bananas, peaches, are some of the nicest served. A wine is drunk, very much of the color of pale sherry, and the little cups are kept filled by the servants with this wine, the guests being drawn off, out of small silver vessels shaped like an English tea-kettle. Most of the wine is known as "mandarin wine," and is made by fermenting rice; but there is also wine from grapes made in North China, but not in large quantities, and very inferior in quality. This liquor or spirit called "sam-shee" is strong, and distilled from millet seed fermented; it is highly intoxicating, and is also used in the compounding as a medicine. To take wine with one another is a mark of good-breeding, and it is done much in the same manner as we do—only the Chinese gentleman considers it a point of good manners to fill a banquet, and drain the cup to the bottom. The dining-room of a mandarin, or any other wealthy gentleman's house, is furnished with chairs and teapoys, and a sofa-table, with two large massive arm-chairs; the upper third of the walls is generally carved work filled up with oiled paper instead of glass, the doorway being covered by a screen or curtain of red cloth or silk, and the apartment is not a mean one with a miniature table with a red cushion on each side of it. The house always stands on a raised terrace, and has two court-yards at least, with a veranda, in which hang many lanterns of various bright colors, in silk, paper, and horn. In the outer court the sedan-chairs of the family are kept, and the more costlier are always waiting there to answer any summons.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A MAN with four wives was brought before a Dutch justice for committing bigamy on a charge of "Four times," as stated in the advertisement added, "Four wives? Well was a very suspicious crime." "Four times no wunt," "Why?" protested the prosecutor, "why you charge him for four times? Vat you do? Will the court explain?" "Yes, I reckspicious. Of he lif mit four wives, he got humbleness enough." I'll mit you, and I got too much humbleness already."

Sponge says, if you wish to recollect a man's name, get acquainted with his mother. For keeping your money from them, there is nothing like this plan.

IN an old edition of some the whole edition, by the exception of the single letter e at the beginning of a word is the only difference between the following:

When the last trumpet soundeth
We shall not all die;
But we shall all be changed

A would-be suicide at Cincinnati was pulled off the track before a coming train by a railroad man, who was then arrested for trying to "mess up the engine any such way is that."

What do opera-singers live on?—Roles.

A party of young men were telling what they would do were they only rich enough. Far out upon the sea, and left bobbing with the waves without a thank to steer his theme, Tom, who has given his epitaph, excepting Paddy Murphy, who, after being asked for his, replied, "Faith, I'll not be for a cowardly act of suicide; you'd be all after savin' yourselves, an' not lavin' be one another. Why I'll be Paddy Murphy that would swim to shore an' save himself, an' then come back and drown himself."

The following was copied literally from an old tombstone in Scotland:

Here lies the body of Alexander MacPherson,
Who was a very extraordinary person,
He was born two years before his grandfather died,
And kept his accoutrements clean and neat,
Until the day
At the battle of Waterloo,
He was killed.

The pallid cheek and the eye of fire
And came out at the back of his coat.

"Look here, Pete," said a knowing darkey, "don't stand dar on de railroad track. Why, don't you 'member what de book say? 'Dey shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain.' Dat mean dat no hoss nor mule nor cow shall hurt you, for you always kept them out of danger, 'member."

"Quite correct, my dear; the natives of wards, be they ne'er so ragged, are clothed in the habiliments of civilization." So Mrs. Conkling remarked to her husband, as she saw the Fenian Brotherhood in full regalia.

A youthful witness, on being asked in the Marlboro Connecticut police court, the other day, where he would go to if he told a lie, replied, "To the reform school, I guess, ma'am."

An apothecary's boy was lately sent to leave at a house a box of pills, and at another six live Fowls. Confused on the way, he left the pills where the fowls should have gone, and the fowls at the pill place. The folks who received the fowls were astonished at reading the accompanying directions, "Swallow one every two hours."

When a girl out West is asked she looks surprised, and says, "I guess, Pap's got a bill which she swim for pills." It will give me pleasure to show you," and proceeds to give a dupli—

Mr. Dorkins joins a Yacht Club, and tries on the Uniform.

Having entered for the Regatta, he proceeds to join his Fleet.

A little Awkward at first; but then he says that he has not got his Sea Legs on yet.

Off the Light-Ship they have a very Stiff Breeze. The Captain orders all hands to get well up to Windward and lie down. Dorkins every now and then Gets Washed. He wants to know if this is considered Fun.

Dorkins's Contribution to Neptune.

The Captain jibes the Yacht suddenly. Dorkins and Friends assume different Positions. (To jibe a boat is to let the mainsail swing from one side to the other, which it often does with great force.)

The Captain orders all hands to haul aft the Sheet. Dorkins asks if he shall haul out at the Bowsprit.

For the first time in his Memory, he is Forced to Decline.

Dorkins incontinently sat down directly over the Centre-Board, which just then struck a Sand-Bar, and bottled him.

The Captain requests him to Let Go the Jib-Sheets. He misunderstands, replies that he ain't Touching them.

Back to Port again. Thinks he will Ride Home.

Result of Dorkins's Yacht Experience.

GERMAN COMPOSERS.

OUR illustration on page 428 is taken from a noble composition by W. LINDENSCHMIT, one of the foremost of modern German artists, slightly altered to bring the main points of the design within the compass of the page. It would be superfluous to dwell on the merits of a work which can speak so well for itself. The grouping and the artistic portraiture are admirable; and, either as a whole or in separate bits, the composition is worthy of careful study. This work is engraved for Harper's Weekly from a photograph of the original cartoon published by MR. THEODORE STROEHER, 839 Broadway.

SCARRON'S MARRIED LIFE.

IN 1646, when he was thirty-six years of age, Scarron, a cripple for life through disease and medicine, went to Paris. For three years before this he had been in possession of some eternal joost at Mans, the duties of which, I suppose, some one else performed. Nor do we know why he gave it up. A lawsuit against his step-mother had turned out badly; but this was only a stronger reason, one would think, for having what he had. However, if he was poor before, he was now destitute, and had to work harder than at his three ways of making money—writing poetry, dedications, and begging-letters. All these paid. He poetry brought him money, his dedications brought him pensions, and his begging brought him gifts. So he went on writing the most and most importunate begger ever known—for fourteen years, till he died. When he was about forty-two he made the acquaintance of Françoise d'Aubigné, then seventeen years old. She was twenty-four years of age. Her father had died some years before, and she had recently lost her mother. Life looked very terrible to the poor girl when Scarron—the most reckless of his class and of a tender pity which she at least knew how to value, offered her all he could. He would make her a sufficient dot to enable her to enter a convent; or he would give her an asylum in his own house, at his wife. She chose the latter, and married the powere cripeod. This marriage is the most touching thing in the life of Scarron. When the notary naked what dowry the bride brought, Scarron replied: "Deux grands yeux mutins, un tres-bon corsage, une paire de belles mains et beaucoup d'esprit." "And what settlement do you make upon her?" "Immortality." Perhaps the immortality that the wife of Scarron got from her first husband was paled in the eyes of some by the more splendor with which she derived from her second husband; for Madame Veuve Scarron became Madame De Maintenon, wife of the Grand Monarque.

As wife of the poor crippled poet, she performed her part of the contract well. She kept perfect order and decency into the ménage. She tamed the wild talk of the habitués, and kept it within bounds; and she lovingly poked the unbridled muse with an aspic'd for own that soon reduced them. More than all, she cherished him for years, and softened, as well as she could, the agonies that racked his tortured frame; and, in an age when regard and infidelity was the rule, she was proud enough to preserve her reputation. "Il n'y a rien," she would say in after years, and under even more trying difficulties, "de plus habile qu'une coudette irréprochable." She was tempted by her lovers. Scarron's friend Ogliers took her in hand, but gave her up in despair. "She was too gouste," Ninon said.

His married life lasted eight years, when he died of a hiccough, on which he promised to write a very fine satire if he ever got over it. The hiccough, however, was too strong for him, and the satire was never given to the world. He had taken the precaution to write his own epitaph. Is it too well known to be quoted? Let us try it, at least, "newly done into English:"

"No foolish envy waste on him
Who sleeps this stone beneath:
Death's pangs he felt a thousand times
Ere yet he suffered death.
Rush! traveler; let no footstep's fall
The sacred stillness break:
'Tis the first night poor Scarron sleeps:
Tread lightly—lest he wake."

BURNETT'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS.—The superiority of these extracts consists in their perfect purity and great strength. They are warranted free from the poisonous oils and acids which enter into the composition of many of the fictitious fruit flavors now in the market. They are not only true to their names, but are prepared from fruits of the best quality, and are so highly concentrated that a comparatively small quantity only need be used.

The Living Machine.

Injure the main spring of a watch, and every portion of the works becomes disordered. The human stomach is to the human system what that elastic piece of metal is to a timekeeper. It regulates the action of the other organs, and controls, to a certain extent, the whole human machine. No medicine may be carried further; for as the weakness or other imperfections of the stomach are manifested on the face of the tissue-pre, so also is the weakness or ultimate failure of the stomach betrayed by the face of the invalid. The complexion is sallow, the white eyes are deficient in lustre and intelligence, and there is a dull, anxious expression on the whole countenance which tell, as plainly as written words could do, that the stomach requires assistance from without to enable her to the wants of the body, and to sustain and renew the vital forces. HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS is a regulator repovating and regulating, and to accomplish this end may be truly said to be the one thing needful. The broken main spring of a watch may be replaced by a new one, but the stomach must be toned, regulated, and strengthened; and this is one of the objects of the HOSTETTER'S BITTERS. Its popularity in every country has been waging a successful contest with dyspepsia in all forms, and is a specific for indigestion it stands alone. When the renovating, invigorating powers have been exhausted, without, at best, doing more than mitigating the complaint, a course of this wholesome and palatable, yet powerful, stomachic effects a perfect and permanent cure. In all cases of dyspepsia the less or more or less disordered; and upon this important gland, as well as upon the stomach and bowels, the Bitters act with singular distinctness, regulating and reinvigorating every secretive and assimilating organ on which bodily and mental health depend.

HOSTETTER'S

With the June Number HARPER'S MAGAZINE entered upon its Forty-first Volume. Containing from fifty to one hundred pages more matter than any other monthly periodical, English or American, the publishers are happy to believe that the Magazine offers to-day a greater variety and the greatest variety of matter, in choice at the contents of the present Number than ever before. It is, in fact, a Miscellaneous Encyclopædia of Social Life—in one case as soon as an ocean steamer, and in the other can be found in any intelligent family among the mountains of Ohio; a paper on Rupert's Land and Its People, another on the Running Turf of America; two Serial Stories—one of keen literary interest, and the other of thrilling plot; a Paper on the Historical Sketch of modern Friedrich; an interesting chat about Canes and Fans; and four Poems of characteristic force and beauty—together with the five special Editorial Departments—make up the contents of this Number, comprising an amount of exciting matter larger than is contained in a volume of Harper's Monthly. The illustrations, of the highest excellence, the variety, and the attractiveness of its contents, and the liberal conditions of its publication, article bearing on current topics, the Publishers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE confidently recommend for its companionship with its previous record, and claim that it is fulfilling the promises which they have made in the past.

CARBOLIC SALVE.

The important discovery of the CARBOLIC ACID as a CLEANSING, PURIFYING, and HEALING Agent is one of the most remarkable results of modern medical research. During the late civil war it was extensively used in the Hospitals, and was found to be not only a thorough disinfectant, but also the most wonderful and speedy HEALING REMEDY ever known.

It is now presented in a scientific combination with other soothing and healing agencies, in the form of a SALVE: and, having been already used in numberless cases with most satisfactory and beneficial results, we have no hesitation in offering it to the public as the most safe, rapid, and effectual remedy for all Sores and Ulcers, no matter of how long standing, for Burns, Cuts, Wounds, and every ABRASION of SKIN or FLESH, and for Skin diseases generally.

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

THE illustration underneath commemorates one of the most interesting events in the history of New York—the first reading of the Declaration of Independence to the American army, by order of General WASHINGTON—of which we find the following account in LOSSING'S "Field-Book of the Revolution:" "WASHINGTON received the Declaration on the 9th of July, 1776, with instructions to have it read to the army. He immediately issued an order for the several brigades, then in and near the city, to be drawn up at six o'clock that evening, to hear it read by their several commanders or their aids. The brigades were formed in hollow squares on their respective parades. The venerable ZACHARIAH GREENE (commonly known as 'PARSON GREENE,' the father-in-law of Mr. THOMPSON, historian of Long Island), yet (1855) living at Hempstead, at the age of ninety-six years, informed me that he belonged to the brigade then encamped on the 'Common,' where the City Hall now stands. The hollow square was formed at about the spot where the Park fountain now is. He says WASHINGTON was within the square, on horseback, and that the Declaration was read in a clear voice by one of his aids. When it was concluded three hearty cheers were given. HOLT'S Journal for July 11, 1776, says: 'In pursuance of the Declaration of Independence, a general jail-delivery took place with respect to debtors.' Ten days afterward, the people assembled at the City Hall, at the head of Broad Street, to hear the Declaration read. They then tock the British arms from over the seat of justice in the court-room, also the arms wrought in stone in front of the building, and the picture of the king in the council chamber, and destroyed them, by fire, in the street. They also ordered the British arms in all the churches in the city to be destroyed. This order seems not to have been obeyed. Those in Trinity Church were taken down and carried to New Brunswick by the Rev. CHARLES INGLIS, rector of the city at the war, and now hangs upon the walls of a Protestant Episcopal church in St. John.

AMERICAN CITIZENSHIP.

IF it is worth while to have any naturalization laws, it is most desirable to have them stringent, and efficiently and honestly administered; and there is no express authority more properly conferred upon Congress than that of providing such laws. Their object is evident. The source of such laws is respect for the suffrage. They aim to secure its intelligent exercise. They say by implication that it is not desirable that the Hottentot and Fejee should have a voice in the government before he can speak the language or understand in the least degree what the responsibilities are of a man of an American citizen are, and while his ignorance leaves him a prey to the most miserable of demagogues. The naturalization laws may suppose that there is to be a national life in this country, and that a certain homogeneity is essential to nationality. In common with all the other provisions of the Constitution, and in harmony with the feelings and convictions of the fathers, the power to establish a rule of naturalization is radically at war with the absurd theory that the Union is to be a loose league of States different in language, traditions, and sympathies, totally impotent at the very points, and for the very purposes, for which power is desirable.

Of course the efficiency of any such laws is to be proved by experiment; and every good citizen who thinks them desirable must also wish that they shall be amended as fast and as far as they are found to be defective. Now that in the State of New York, the chief point of naturalization, these laws are cruelly administered, there is no more denial than there is that such law exist. Some amendment is imperative: and MR. NOAH DAVIS, of New York, therefore introduced a bill into Congress which sought to remedy the proved defects of the present system. MR. DAVIS's bill required three years' residence in the country, and the intention to become a citizen, six months in the State, and thirty days in the county or parish. The applicant was to be fifty years old, and then in a State court of general jurisdiction. The naturalized citizen was not to vote until six months after his admission. Persons dishonorably discharged from the service might become citizens after one year's actual residence. These are all reasonable requirements. They are framed with express reference to the proved defects of the present system. They would be equally true to other States only. The Democrats bitterly oppose every measure which aims to protect the ballot and secure an honest vote. The Democratic members voted almost unanimous against it. Such a bill would be opposed by those who had local and especial interests to defeat. Therefore those who have the Chinese immigration protested. Or, again, such a bill would be opposed by politicians afraid of alienating the foreign vote, and they attacked it.

By this combined assault one of the best measures of the session was defeated. We have carefully read the debate, and can not find a single cogent argument alleged against the bill. MR. FLORENCE, who led the Democrats, who voted solid against it, said that the bill was one of the waves of the radical revolution; that it was not intended to operate in uniform rule; that it changed laws familiar to European countries owing to immigrants; and that it was inspired by bigotry, malignity, and intolerance toward foreigners and immigrants. Such talk as this can not be called argument; and it is a droll suggestion that we are not to improve our laws because in their unimproved state they are known to European men. MR. COX opposed it upon his favorite ground that New York is a terribly maligned little heaven below. The Republican objections, as we have said, were special and local. But what probably influenced many of the Republican negative votes was a feeling that to defend the principle of the suffrage by stringent naturalization laws would alienate "the foreign vote." We hope that this fear will not influence the Senate in considering Senator CONKLING's bill. Let us have a wise naturalization law honestly executed, and let not the Republican party fear to take the responsibility.

For there is no greater mistake than the constant supposition that the people of this country are not intelligent enough to see the reason of really good laws, and to support the party that proposes them. The Democratic leaders always appeal to prejudice and selfishness. Their attitude presupposes an immense popular ignorance and stupidity. The policy of the Democratic leaders is that of the old Roman tyrants, bread and games, to keep the people from thinking. Governor HOFFMAN, for instance, bids for "the foreign vote" by printing a telegram that he has sent somebody to bring home honorably home a man who has broken our laws and killed innocent neighbors. MR. TWEED bids higher, by offering to pay all expenses. MR. ELDRIDGE, MR. BROOKS, friends, put in their little bids by loud protests and defenses of Roman Catholics against imaginary attacks.

This is a business which may be safely left to those gentlemen. If such a course is really necessary, we are so connected with Europe that our enemies allege. But if the Republican party confides itself to the general good sense of the people, and to the desire to understand what is really for its advantage, as it did during the great debate from 1854 to 1860, which brought it into power—the debate in which it showed to every working-man in the land that slavery was necessarily his enemy, and that the Democratic party was the party of slavery—if it will trust its own great principles and the intelligence of the country, it will be as sure of the future as it is proud of the past.

THE UNITED STATES AND CUBA.

MR. SUMNER'S Cuban resolutions are an admirable supplement to the President's message. In his message the President abstains to the steps he has taken in the form of representations to the Spanish Government for the securing to the people of Cuba self-government and the right of independent self-government. MR. SUMNER's resolutions declare the sympathy of the people of the United States "with their fellow-Americans in Cuba struggling for independence," and with the people of Spain in giving the United States a model for a free and liberal institutions at home, calling upon the Spaniards, for the sake of peace, to recognize the independence of Cuba. The resolutions also, like the message, deplore the atrocities of the Cuban warfare upon both sides. The message and the resolutions together show that what we believe to be the actual intelligent public opinion upon the subject in this country.

There is an instinctive, and what may be called hereditary sympathy, in the United States with any people struggling for the establishment of a foreign power. That feeling in regard to Cuba would be much more pronounced than it is but for two facts. One is that, while the disposition at home upon that ground, would continue the BOURBON regime in Cuba. It has been therefore that the United States government has not properly plead against the new order in Spain, before it was tried, the tyranny of the Bourbons, and the unanimity of the people by which the Cuban cause has been managed has produced neither confidence nor respect. Moreover, it has been always impossible to ascertain the facts. General BANKS, for instance, understands them in one way, and the President in another. The best public opinion, in this country, therefore, while sympathizing with the general movement, has insisted that our most honorable traditions, and the most obvious duties as they are founded, demanded that the Government, under existing circumstances, ought not to interfere. It maintained that the Cuban war has undoubtedly seemed sometimes to be a want of that sympathy of which we speak, and after the emphatic declaration of the President that nothing shall be done inconsistent with that policy, it is most proper and desirable that the national sympathy of the United States with those who are striving for independence, and their desire to see elsewhere the same general liberty which they enjoy, should be officially expressed to the Spanish Government.

MR. TRUEMAN, the Democratic Senator from Ohio, says that the proposition amounts to nothing. But it amounts to a great deal. It says authoritatively to the Spanish Government that, while we do not as yet recognize revolution justified in interfering, we nevertheless watch the contest with interest and hope, and that we believe the day of foreign intervention upon this continent has passed by. The resolutions officially declare the opinion of this Government upon that point. To declare that opinion and that sympathy is to do all that can be done short of actual interference; and, therefore, it is doing all that ought to be done. MR. TRUEMAN, indeed, would have us direct Spain to recognize Cuban independence. But the public good sense of this country will decide whether, when we have recently and properly admitted so many new citizens in the late rebel States, when the forced immigration of coolies is considered so threatening by the trades unions, and when the San Domingo annexation project is still pending, it is desirable to violate our honorable policy and interfere in the troubles of another country. Such will be the inevitable consequences of such interference, for the purpose of adding to our population more than a million and a half of people wholly alien from us in principles, language, and traditions, a third of whom are barbarously ignorant, two hundred thousand of them, according to General BANKS, speaking only the language of the tribes of Africa.

HONESTY AND CAPACITY IN OFFICE.

WHILE Congress can not contain its wrath at the mere proposition to reform the civil service, the effete monarchies look over the water, having heard the excellence of the reform, pushes it still further. It is our privilege to enjoy a civil service system under which we have outright, according to MR. JENCKES, who has made a thorough study of the subject, one dollar in every four collected. And the cause of this enormous loss is that, in appointing a gentleman to appraise laces, we do not ask whether he is an honest man, who can tell a lace veil from a gunnybag, but whether he voted the regular ticket at the last election. This is the great American system, according to certain political doctors in Congress. This is the fruit of free institutions, and the logical result of the submerging principle that every body is as good as every body else. Meanwhile the poor, infatuated British Queen, in council, has ordered that any body who wishes to fill a government office in England, with a few exceptions, may apply for examination. The best qualified will receive the appointment, after a satisfactory probation of six months. How aristocratic!

So absurdly excellent is the working of this system that some of the houses supply to the government examiners for the lists of successful candidates, that they may select clerks from them. And the practice of a good examination is one of the best credentials a young man can have. Superficially, this would seem to be a simple and reasonable enough; but, as in the practice of a monarchy, it necessarily and obviously leads to an aristocracy, and no well-regulated American could think of it for a moment. To withstand the insidious wiles of the aristocratic tendency of a civil service that would put merely honest and capable men in public positions, it is our glorious privilege to increase our own taxes and to commend our inclinations to the admiration and imitation of mankind, by keeping those positions for Mr. Reddy the Blacksmith and his efficient coworkers at the polls.

THE INCOME TAX.

IN his speech in favor of retaining the income tax Senator SHERMAN sketched the history of the tax in Great Britain, and said that in 1816 and 1817 there was a loud demand for its repeal from the property holders, and a great deal of clamor against it. Now the best account of that period says that "the dislike of the rural population was as fixed as that of the inhabitants of towns." It was, in fact, a question of good faith, as it is with us; and with us also it is a constitutional question. The income tax was first proposed by MR. PITT in 1798. He first assessed incomes of £65 a year, and gradually rose to those of £200 a year. On such incomes, and all above that sum, ten per cent was imposed. It was announced as a war tax. The act declared that it was to be "for and during the continuance of the war, and no longer." SIR WILLIAM CURTIS stated afterward in Parliament that he was in the House when the tax was first proposed, and that he heard MR. PITT declare that it was a war tax only, and should positively cease on the restoration of peace. But at the end of the war the Government preferred to reduce the rate from ten to five per cent., and continue the tax. Then began what Senator SHERMAN called the "great deal of clamor." That is to say, the people of Great Britain imperatively demanded that the Government should keep its word. And after a flood of petitions and a most vigorous and exciting debate, the tax was abolished, and MR. WILBERFORCE said that the property tax had down that war and income tax were wedded together.

But in 1842, when there was a deficit of £2,000,000, and income radical measure was essential, Sir ROBERT PEEL proposed to renew the tax, laying three per cent upon incomes above £150. He showed that his proposition was based upon the fact of the situation, which offered only the alternative of an income tax or loans: and Sir ROBERT insisted the duration of the tax to three years, or to five, if Parliament should direct—a proposition which seemed to the country to be considered it to be exceptional impost, justifiable only in an emergency.

He also defended it upon the ground that it was really a war tax, the debt having been largely the consequence of the war; and Senator SHERMAN takes the same ground in the Senate. Meanwhile the income tax in Great Britain is continued; the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, MR. ROBERT LOWE, saying, in presenting his last budget, that, although a good deal could be said against it, he had no alternative to offer, and would make it as moderate and fair as possible, but could not think of striking off so great a branch of the revenue.

In this country the aggregate of taxes is $292,000,000, of which $27,000,000 are levied upon property or its income. This sum (a little less than a tenth of the whole) is paid by two hundred and seventy-three thousand persons. The other nine-tenths of the whole taxation are levied upon consumption. The argument urged against the income tax is that it is unconstitutional and vexatious, and that it was imposed under a solemn engagement that it should be temporary. The argument in its favor is that, with all its defects, to which every system is subject, it lays the burden where it can be best borne, and that it is considering all the facts, one of the best systems of a disagreeable business. If it be a direct tax, it is plainly unconstitutional; and in the Supreme Court has decided that direct taxes, in the intention of the Constitution, are those upon land and slaves, and so the rents of lands are legally regarded as lands themselves, it would seem that the tax upon incomes is a direct tax, and must be laid "in proportion to the census or enumeration." Moreover, if it lays the burden where it can best be borne, it does so only by recognizing a class of citizens in a manner not harmonious with the spirit of the Constitution. If you lay an income tax with an exemption of $2500, the man upon a salary of $3000 pays such a tax; the owner of a property of $30,000, with a revenue from it of eight per cent., pays nothing. And if you lay a tax upon luxuries, the clerk and the proprietor may choose whether they will pay it, and their choice will depend upon their ability. The defects of the system seem to be almost inseparable from it. MR. GLADSTONE says that experience has shown one fixed exemption to be better than to continue frequent alleviations, but any system is essentially objectionable which does not ascertain and consider the source of income.

In refusing to continue the tax the Senate undoubtedly conforms to the public desire.

FOREIGN DEMAND FOR OUR BREADSTUFFS.

As the date of our last issue it was stated that the French, who had suddenly appeared in our market as purchasers of wheat, had unloaded some portion of it, and had considerably receded to the limits fixed for English agents, who immediately became buyers at about $1 20 per bushel for Club Milwaukee, a continental demand for wheat again arose, and this quality, on the 23d of June, was at $1 27½ per bushel. On the 24th the French purchases ceased, and the price receded to $1 20. The subject is now absorbing one in all financial circles. It is asked, Will the circumstances continue which call for heavy purchases of grain from this country?

The telegraph informs us that a number of vessels have been fitted out at Marseilles to obtain wheat from the region about the Black Sea, and great efforts will be made to procure sufficient supplies to prevent a more important advance here. There are indications that the Government of France is urging, if not actually buying, these purchases. M'CULLOCH informs us (1869) "that, in order to keep the Parisian populace in good-humor, the bakers were compelled to sell bread in scarce times at low prices, their loss being reimbursed to them from the public or consumers' revenue."

There is unquestionably a political necessity for cheap bread in France nearly as great as that which the English conceive to exist with respect to theirs. There is this difference between the two situations, that, while there is no cessation on the English import, the French are adopting measures only for unfavorable seasons. MR. CAIRD, an English writer on agricultural subjects of great eminence, states that the French harvest is below the average makes a difference in the wheat crop of 17,000,000 bushels. "Large gross and green crops, or vice versa," he adds, "are two to use of our corn. France is exactly reversed; her corn on exhaustive crops being as two to one of her grass and green crops." The production of wheat in France is consequently from this exhaustive process lower than in favorable years. The production per acre, in English bushels, is stated by MR. CAIRD as follows: England, 28; Ireland, 24; Prussia, Spain, and Holland, 23; Belgium, 21; France, only 15½. This is due in part to the quality of the soil, that of France being in many parts a sandy instead of a clayey loam.

The English writers agree in this, that when the harvest only in England it is ordinarily felt upon the Continent, and that while in good seasons France supplies twelve per cent. of the English demand for breadstuffs, in seasons she is a competitor in foreign markets. The fact that she is so is the subject of complaint in London and Liverpool, inasmuch as the latter aspire to control this trade in all parts of the world, and expect that the Continent will obtain supplies from them.

Although within a few days past there have been copious rains in England, yet it is certain that the previous want of it will be severely felt. We subjoin a few extracts from English papers as recently as the 7th and 8th of June. The reports from France are not less favorable.

"DOSOQUIN'S TOBASHER."—MILTON, Monday.—There is still no rain. With only 7½ inches of rain in 1870, and of this less than two inches since April 1, the condition of the land is one of complete dryness. The whole of the early sown turnips are lost. The land is so hot and void of moisture that it is quite vain to sow afresh, though some have ventured on that course. Where it looked the drought last year every other crop is getting rapidly worse. On Sunday, though a fresh east wind blew, the heat in the shade included 101 degrees, and the barometer rose to 30.50, steady. Put stock is rising rapidly in price, and lean cattle are becoming a drug."

"HAYNET PROSPECTS.—Mr. T. C. SCOTT, of Knaphill Farm, Surrey, publishes the result of a personal and detailed inspection of farms in the home and some of the midland counties from the 1st to the 20th inst. The following conclusions may now be arrived at in the matter of the peculiarities of the produce of that season: 1. That we shall have a good crop of wheat, notwithstanding the severe ravages of the wire-worm and slug. 2. We shall have a light crop of barley, because it has been parched by the sun and scourged by the wire-worm, and no amount of rain can now remedy its stunted growth and deficiency of plants. 3. From the same causes oats will be a light crop, but not so generally injured as barley. 4. Where oats have a favorable appearance, arising from the long continuance of black and wet weather in April and May. Spring beans look a shade better, and peas also, although the latter were early much injured in the leaf by a light, fawn-colored, beetle-looking insect, which, as yet, seems to know much about. All these cereal and pulse crops will be some much sooner in the stack than was anticipated six weeks ago, on account of premature ripening. 5. Hay will be light, though very middling my memory, because there is no bottom grass any where. Artificial grasses and clovers look rather dry, and suffer much from the caterpillars, which, when they are extensively grown, look exceedingly fresh and luxuriant; but much of these crops is now being sacrificed to the maintenance of livestock on barn pastures. 6. Mangel-wurzel will be a fair, if not a heavy crop, as it was put in in superb order, and has kept up very well, notwithstanding the drought, and luxuriates in a dry summer and weather. Swedes are still somewhat uncertain, because, although they were, and are still being, put in in perfect order, they have suffered from time to twice swept clean away by, and are still at the mercy of, the pestiferous fly, in the shape of innumerable ravages and rain soft warm weather. 7. Potatoes, although several times touched by late spring frosts, do not appear permanently injured, and look well, generally speaking, and the drought should continue and cause a light crop, it will likely be of a superior quality. 8. Turnips that year planted some potatoes on the bare earth, covering them with manure and then soil, and they look absolutely better than those planted on the manure."

The price of wheat is probably now remunerative to the farmers of the United States, and is relatively higher at Chicago than here, due to speculative tendencies. It is wise always to adopt that as the level at which the crop will leave a profit, at least on the part of those who can not hold with convenience. The policy of holding on in part of those times of those who are financially strong, in order to provide against the contingency of a short crop, is beneficial to the country. It is for others to judge of the peculiar circumstances which call for the one or the other policy; but it seems clear to us, as the land devoted to grain and the present crops in England is two to one of that devoted to grain, and as the farmer are bad, and as the wheat crop of France is injured, that there will be a demand for our breadstuffs to continue during the coming season.

THE POST-OFFICE AS A TAXING MACHINE.

DR. FRANKLIN considered the post-office chiefly as a source of revenue; but the position taken by Senator SUMNER, in the debate upon the franking system, is undoubtedly correct that it should be considered rather a means of public education and development. He would have the rates of letter postage reduced to the smallest coin, one cent. Lord ASHBURTON said in England that postage is one of the worst of taxes, that it is a tax upon the communication of the people. When ROWLAND HILL's reform was proposed, Sir ROBERT PEEL admitted that "great social and political advantages would arise from it. Viscount SANDON declared that the post-office should be used to stimulate other sources of revenue. Mr. CORNEWALL LEWIS, when the financial point, insisted that the lowest possible trading profit would secure the highest revenue. Mr. O'CONNELL said that it was impossible to exaggerate the benefits of low postage; and at last, in 1840, the reform was achieved by the bill which established a uniform rate for uniform weight, this rate the lowest unit of coin—a penny—and the abolition of franking.

In the recent debate in the Senate, Senator HOWE said that the present rate of postage is not oppressive. But Mr. SUMNER showed from testimony, as well as reason, that it is oppressive, not only directly upon various classes of the people, but indirectly, by preventing correspondence. The revenue from the post-office might be at first diminished by the smaller rate; but, as it would be promptly replaced by postage, the general advantages would be, in Mr. SUMNER's opinion, invaluable. The post-office, he thinks, should be no more expected to pay for itself than every other department of the government. But his speech, which, as usual, was most carefully prepared, admirably fortified with the history and philosophy of the subject, did not persuade the Senate. The Senators apparently agreed with Mr. HOWE that it was desirable to continue to make the Department beneficent by the free distribution of documents, but they were unwilling to risk the reduction of the rate and the abolition of the franking system.

Honorable members, therefore, will continue to send their washing home gratis in the mails, and tons of public documents will be carefully wrapped in Washington and sent out by the same mails, to be instantly ground up as waste paper. Meanwhile, we hope that Senators who favor the reform will stop vigorously the privilege left them, and frank Mr. SUMNER's speech all over the country, to help form a public opinion which will insist upon a wise substitution for the franking system.

AN EXPERIMENTAL CHRISTIAN.

IT is difficult to imagine any thing more preposterous than the idea which Bishop COLENSO was a "Christian." Those who denounce him as a novelist may wisely remember that the Master himself spoke in parables. Those who declare his life to have been a vanity of vanities should gravely reflect whether they honor the Christ by asserting that men whose spotless life and great powers are consecrated to making men better is the chief of sinners. What is essential Christianity? Is it not a right following of the great Christian example? And if, as a certain clergyman said, Sir ISAAC NEWTON was not a Christian because he could not be said upon his death-bed, "I feel I am resting on Christ with the simple faith of a child," who can imagine a Christian exactly like any Christian because he wrote, on the day before his death, in the full flush of life, "I have always prayed to God to accept me for the merits of the life and lessons of our Saviour, because I feel it?" If words certify as saving Christian belief, certainly JESUS CHRIST died for JORDEN who visited the widow and the fatherless with a tenderer blessing than DICKENS?

A clergyman in Boston recently made him self notorious for a day by denouncing DICKENS. "What one of his books," asked he, "breathes the spirit of Christ, or is redolent with the fragrance of the Gospel?" What one of them is not? is a question which even the clergyman could not answer. In his preference above the wisdom of the suggestion of Mr. DICKENS to his children in his will, which was read in Westminster Abbey, and which for certainty in a broad spirit, not accepting the narrow construction of any man nor of my sect.

THE VALUE OF CHARACTER.

IF a newspaper should publish a paragraph stating that "Yesterday a ordinary day Mr. PETER COOPER went into the Bank of Commerce, and, after he left, it was discovered that the bank had lost the check in the currency drawer, and we should like to know how Mr. COOPER explains the matter," we doubt if Mr. COOPER would be considered a thief; for, happily, in civilized countries, and among men of honor, character is still of some value. But if Mr. LAMBERTON were accused of being influenced in his official conduct toward FISKE by the fact that his aunt's cousin had sold a horse to Mr. FISKE's partner, and had been paid for it, it would disturb public confidence in the Prime Minister just as much as the charge that Mr. FISKE's partner's colleague to Cuba is determined by the fact that a lawyer who is his son-in-law has been paid certain fees by Senhors Cooper and Fogg.

This absurd aspersion upon the Secretary of State was repeated by Mr. FITCH in the House of Representatives; but upon his attention being called to the facts as stated in the explanation which has been published, Mr. FITCH promptly and handsomely drew the implied charge, saying that "he had never seen that contradiction, and had had no knowledge that the statement made had been contradicted." In the face of that contradiction he could do nothing more than retract what he had stated on that point."

REALISTIC ART.

We have little space for correspondence, and we do not mean by publishing the following letter to invite a discussion which, as we could not give room. But the tone of Mr. MOORE's excellent letter is not controversial, and it is an interesting matter from the point of view which it presents:

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly.

In the notice in the Academy Exhibition, in your paper for June 18, are some remarks about the works of Mr. EDWARD LEAR, and without considering which I have a word or two to say which may be misinterpreted by those who have not seen Mr. LEAR's some genuine a better understanding of what we are trying to do than have attempted. I am not, therefore, in all such remarks that our principles are misunderstood, more or less, that it seems to me useful to take advantage of such occasions to state them as plainly as possible—especially now that the hostile feeling, which originated in England some years ago, toward these principles is happily passing away, and articles at kind and thoughtful as the one to which I now allude are more and then appearing, encouraged by the public, in the merits of the works produced upon them. This discussion, carried on with a desire to ascertain what is the best means of truth may lie, can not fail to be useful to artists and others, and it seems to me desirable that any or us who have any thing clearly in mind of thought and experience bearing upon the subject should write briefly for the general good. The remarks of Mr. JOHN JOHNS (the author of the article under consideration) are, like many others made about realistic works and principles, partly right and partly wrong. More attentive study of our works, together with incessant study of nature, would show him, I think, that there was still some of all the truth in his principles; but that we also appreciated principles in some respects much more important, which need to be fitted to those which he has before us.

If the whole matter can be attached.

"We are not here to paint as they do," says our kind critic. Well, perhaps not; it may indeed be that we do not at all succeed in representing what we see in such a way that another can see it. But perhaps, also, nature might be seen somewhat as we see it if a painter should look carefully enough, having in mind meanwhile certain principles upon which we work. But first it is necessary that two important facts should be understood—that nature is infinite, and is the supreme art; and that we are finite, and our perceptions and powers of expression are limited. Consequently a great or less range of nature's aspects truly; but as man are to the same extent artists work ought to be accepted for the sake of learning to see what he sees. We may be, for instance, wrong in our feeling for sunshine should. A good picture will always look strange to us at first—but it does not look strange to us after we have say thing to give us. Besides, the most adequate representation can render it impossible for the spectator to realize the landscape his picture carry receptible resemblance at once to every beholder. The more subtle an artist's perceptions become the less possibility there is in rendering them adequately—first he must invent the best possible short-hand to express his thoughts and feelings, and then the spectator must learn his short-hand before he can read.

Then to realize the poetry of artists, think of best, and, therefore, instead or exhibitions of pictures represented in the Academy and elsewhere, the wide wooden of natural beauty, and visitors who come to learn to see, and not merely in search of pleasant, clear pictures representing those familiar and most easily written aspects only. Such a course would be found to be as entertaining during an otherwise idle moment. Just as the student of music has to go to the most complicated pictures to the exhibitions, because if people do not find it so, they will not learn to understand its qualities, which they have learned to look for as "the kind of art," and they will give them further attention. The people are not wholly to blame for this; the exhibitions are in fault. The public should be in some respects irrespective of the mere quality of the pictures proportion to the size of the rooms, and therefore it is unbelieving that it requires a greater effort than many persons are willing to make to get the most enjoyment not for the attention to become fixed upon small and delicately painted pictures, which are almost lost in overcrowded exhibitions is, that it induces artists to resort to the most violent means and expedients in order to draw attention. Our little works which have been sent to the exhibitions have been in this position so doubt; for it has not been any part of our aim to hide want of power wherever it existed. They have had little of the attractions which command attention generally, and we have been surprised that they have been so much noticed as they have.

"Do they not comprehend, gradation, harmony?" asks our friend; "and are not these qualities in nature?" At present we are striving to learn them fully some of the wonders of beauty which we find in the plain aspects of most ordinary clear daylight, consequently we do not paint many effects of more picturesque effects of mist or "atmosphere" as vastly easier thing to do, and have little to do it, than many people know, and an expedient of great convenience for evading difficulties. We do not "paint as they do" as these qualities and enjoy them greatly; they are often among the finest in nature. But it may be noticed that when the atmosphere is most pure and delightful it is least visible. We don't "paint a fog" as such as in clear air. Our subjects are chosen, for the most part, when the atmosphere is exceedingly clear, not only because we love this clearness, but also because it is then possible to follow the lovely forms of distant mountains more fully and to draw them more entirely—that is, to realize more truth and to express more of the beauty of their wonderful structure and other than would otherwise be possible. While I write, it is a lovely June morning; the air is marvelously clear. The distant mountain is between fifteen and twenty miles distant, but I can see all the lines and larger sculpture with wonderful distinctness; there is some doubt whether I could draw all out in a picture though the most of it is, of course, so involved in mystery as to be infinitely full of suggestive beauty. Its clear color of pure turquoise and pale amethyst is lovely beyond all words, and I am sure that the full truth of beauty and expression or the mountain are in these, and that the air is filled with it. But at times when alone artists seem to call atmosphere, all these are veiled—the mountains become only a grey line against the sky, and the scene of its noble character is gone.

But what qualities in nature are those which we artists generally chose; they want "atmosphere," not the mountains, but they get it, indeed, with infinitely less pains. But it does not appear that artists generally care for the noble and the beautiful things such as involve thorough and difficult drawing of visual forms, but rather than they like the less dignified aspects, which reveal multitudinous details of early and late morning. We have to paint the atmosphere—that kind of Indian summer haze which is just enough to obscure all distant forms. This is only to be found early enough, no doubt; but we should all be sorry if Indian summer should last for ever. We all since our landscape artists have spent their time thus far, and, with a sun, in painting "dreamy haze," be it not well that it be so at last, when we have had all the wonderful forms and colors of things as they are revealed in clear and light by a sun.

As for gradation and harmony, if these qualities are not indeed in our works then we have missed the best in vain; for upon these, the first especially, depend all expression of truth and beauty in whatever. But can you not elaborately give the details without losing the landscape? This question is the one most generally understood as the main one at issue between the students of realistic principles and the mass of other artists (it is not, by any means, the main question); and the answer is that the beauty and unity which we see in nature are not to be represented in art by denying the fact of redundance; and no adequate expression of redundance is ever to be attained without most careful drawing of details. It is quite certain, however, that any artist who strives to draw details faithfully will but for a long time, comparatively speaking, be failure. He will need patience and incessant labor before he can attain such grasp and mastery as will enable him to produce finished results of any kind. The failure of the timid but if he is overpowered by nothing worse. He should hear in mind always, as a safeguard, that his careful drawing is not to be for the sake of imitation, but for interpretation.

It is not assumed that our works are more than studies; and in one sense they ought never to be more, or rather they ought never to be less. It is quite conceivable that art to render natural aspects in its most delicate and subtle forms which is most precious in nature and pictures constructed by such art are not to be called mere studies in the sense of sketches; but there is no chance of ever attaining such art by following the "short-hand" which the mass of other artists seem to prefer. Art truly is something more than short-hand, and is the most refined and natural transcript. C. H. MOORE.

WEST COTTAGE, NEW HAMPSHIRE, June, 1870.

NOTES.

THE London Daily News, alluding to Professor GOLDWIN SMITH's letter to Mr. DISRAELI, says:

"Mr. DISRAELI has been engaged in a controversy conflicts with Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH. The fact that he has declined, himself, to take the initiative, and, if possessed weapons, shown a consciousness of having been foiled in the encounter, is a powerful testimony to the skill with which Mr. SMITH has wielded his. It is impossible to read the letter to be, of all others, the most unfitted by the nature of the office for the feelings of the country, and that the imputation will give the greatest offense to the people. It is probably mistaken. The Premier is not a casuistes, in the truth of which Mr. DISRAELI himself does not believe. Mr. GLADSTONE, before the ship comes in sailor. 'Coward' is a word which is not ordinarily applied to Mr. DISRAELI. But it is applied to him in this case; and, written and setteth up he may, he may perhaps the strong hand of the Premier."

We are very glad to see that railroad passengers are deposed to protest against the summary ejectment of those who are obliged to travel upon a ticket which they have purchased and authorized to show them. If a difference arises between the most orderly passenger and the conductor, the latter can stop the train, "Put off" the passenger several times recently upon the Morris and Essex road, and when a committee of the passengers waited upon the President to make a respectful indication of a most annoying regulation, they were informed that the spirit of the regulation was in the conductors, and were metaphorically "put off" with the peremptory manner. The feeling of dissatisfaction with the irritating management of the Morris and Essex road upon the part of passengers who are obliged to travel upon a line is represented by the committee as almost unanimous. The conduct of the Company, as reported, shows all the arrogance of a confident monopoly. The appeal of the passengers, of course, is to public opinion; and it is the duty of conductors to decide whether it is for their pecuniary interest that the road should be managed with such a total disregard of the convenience of the public as to make every passenger who must depend upon it its enemy.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

June 20.—In the Senate, the main business of the day was the Civil Rights Appropriation bill, including the abolition of the Freedmen's Bureau. Senator SUMNER moved to amend the bill by striking out the words, "and no distinction in civil rights or discrimination shall be made among citizens of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State and Territory to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, and to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property, as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding." The amendment was rejected by a vote of 38 to 9. The Freedmen's Bureau bill was adopted. It declares the State entitled to representation in Congress when it has ratified the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments in good faith.

June 21.—No business of public interest was transacted in the Senate. In the House the Civil Rights bill amending the Patent laws was not concurred in.

THE LATE DR. NADAL.

THE Methodist Church has just sustained another serious loss by the death of the Rev. BERNARD H. NADAL, D.D., which occurred very suddenly on the 20th ult., at Madison, New Jersey. DR. NADAL was born in Maryland, in 1813; and in 1835, having united with the Baltimore Conference, became a preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church. His early labors were in Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia; and he very soon became an earnest participant in the discussion of the slavery question, which was then agitating the Church. With characteristic independence, he warmly advocated the views which a few years afterward became the distinctive feature of the Northern branch, when the denomination had split asunder.

His early education was somewhat limited, but every opportunity for culture was sedulously improved; and when, in 1847, he was appointed to a church in Carlisle, Pennsylvania, the seat of Dickinson College, he pursued the regular collegiate course in that institution of learning without neglecting his pastoral duties, and regularly graduated with high honors. Soon afterward he accepted a professorship in Asbury University, Indiana. Here he became known as a vigorous writer; and one of his former professors, DR. MCCLINTOCK, having become editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review, encouraged him to become a contributor to its pages. He was one of the earliest of the editorial contributors to the Methodist, and remained on its editorial staff until his death. The movement for lay representation found in him an earnest supporter. One of the last of his published papers was a letter to a New York daily paper in defense of the junior book agent. For several years after his brief sojourn in Indiana, DR. NADAL was pastor of prominent churches in New York, Brooklyn, and other cities. On the organization of the Drew Theological Seminary he was appointed to the Professorship of Church History; and, on the death of DR. MCCLINTOCK, was selected to discharge the duties of Acting President of that institution. Up to the day of his death DR. NADAL had been in his usual health, and it is not known that he had any premonition of his approaching end—"One moment in the full enjoyment of his faculties, and the next moment gone."

DR. NADAL was a conscientious student, a thoroughly cultivated and acute theologian, and a successful preacher. His sermons were characterized by deep and earnest feeling, not less than by an effective style of pulpit oratory. Within a brief space of time, four prominent clergymen of the Methodist Church have fallen in the midst of their labors, almost without warning. Each filled his own sphere in the Church with distinguished ability, but none with more singleness of purpose and Christian fidelity than DR. NADAL.

HON. RICHARD L. LARREMORE.

THIS gentleman, who has just retired from the Presidency of the Board of Education to take a seat on the Bench, was born September 6, 1830, at Astoria, Long Island. He graduated in 1850 at Rutger's College, and immediately commenced the study of law in the office of BETTS & RONDSON, in this city. In 1852 he was admitted to the Bar. His tastes led him to avoid criminal cases, and he soon obtained a large and successful business in civil suits and in real estate. He was several times offered a nomination to the State Assembly, but always declined the honor. At the recent Commencement of the University of the City of New York the honorary degree of LL.D. was conferred upon him.

Apart from his distinction as a lawyer, Mr. LARREMORE has achieved an honorable reputation by his devotion to the cause of popular education. His efforts in the New York Constitutional Convention of 1867 to provide for the free education of the children of this city were worthy of all praise. For several years past Mr. LARREMORE has occupied the honorable and responsible position of President of the Board of Education, and spared no efforts to improve our system of free education, and extend its benefits to the children of every grade of society. In May of this year he was elected Judge of Common Pleas, and has resigned his seat in the Board to enter upon the duties of his new position.

A RAILROAD ACCIDENT.

We give on this page an illustration of the recent fatal accident that took place at "Long Bridge," on the Vermont and Massachusetts Railroad. It was caused by a collision with a hand-car, on which the section-master was passing over the bridge, under the impression that he had ample time to reach the next station before the arrival of the train, which he was prevented from seeing by a sharp curve until too late to avoid the shock. An iron bar on the hand-car caught under the engine, throwing it from the track. The wheels of the engine displaced the timbers of the bridge, and the baggage car, when it came to the weakened spot, fell through into the river below. The first passenger car followed in such a way that its front end shot under the rear end of the baggage car. The second passenger car fell endwise, remaining in an nearly a perpendicular position as its wrecked condition would allow. The last car did not go down, the forward truck only falling through the bridge. After the cars had gone down the engine was pulled down backward, the tender falling first, then the engine going down, leaving the forward end of the frame caught in the bridge.

Three persons were killed outright by this accident, and more than twenty seriously wounded. Our illustration is engraved from a photograph by MR. MOORE, of Athol, Massachusetts.

THE STORY OF A SHIPWRECK.

CHAPTER II.

A fruitless Search for Seals.—A Storm on the Coast.—A Night of Terror.—Cast Away.—Getting Ashore.—Looking to God.—Preparations for Living on the Island.

THE first thing to be done after getting ashore was to look for seals. The men had scanned the shores closely in coming into the bay, and as soon as the vessel was anchored, and the sails were secured, they continued the search over every beach, and at every point of land that was in view, but not a seal was to be seen. Mr. Raynal thought that, as it was now summer, the month of December having fairly set in, the seals might have gone up into the land to avoid the heat of the mid-day sun, and he determined to make an excursion with Captain Musgrave upon the shore and into the interior to see what they could discover. Accordingly, as soon as every thing was properly arranged on board, they took the boat and went ashore.

They rambled about for some time, climbing rocks and cliffs, exploring the little bays and indentations of the shore, and penetrating as far as they could into the thickets that grew in the interior. They found plenty of traces of seals, in the form of paths which the animals had worn in the herbage and in the bushes, but none of the animals themselves. In making these explorations their progress was very slow, being much impeded not only by the density of the vegetation, but also by the numerous chasms and "crevasses," which had been opened by the frost and by the rain, in the rocks, and often in the soft earth. These pitfalls, or "breakneeks," as Mr. Raynal called them, were the more dangerous on account of their being almost entirely concealed by thickets of shrubbery and herbage.

Quite disappointed at the fruitlessness of their search, they returned on board about sunset. Their feeling of discouragement was, however, somewhat relieved by being told by the men that they had seen two seals, of the kind called sea-lions, swimming about the vessel during their absence. The animals came, they said, to the surface at intervals, lifting their big round heads out of the water, and uttering, as they inspired the gusts of air for which they came, a kind of hoarse barking sound, indicative of anger, and of defiance of the intruders.

Mr. Raynal and Captain Musgrave made their arrangements for setting out the next morning for a general and systematic survey of the island, with the double object of searching for silver and for seals. They set off very early, leaving the men on board. They experienced great difficulty in forcing their way through the thickets which bordered the shore, being obliged sometimes to crawl under the branches upon their hands and knees. After reaching the interior they ascended a high hill, from which they had a view of a bay on the other side of the island, which they recognized as Monument Bay, so called from the artificial appearance which the sea had given to the rocks surrounding it, by wearing them away in such a manner as to leave arches, corridors, columns, and other architectural forms, the whole constituting a very remarkable and very curious scene. The explorers descended very cautiously to search for seals. When they reached the margin of it, however, they stopped on the crest of the cliffs which bordered it to take their breakfast, and then they clambered down to the beach below.

They saw a few seals here, though very few. As to indications of silver ore, though they had looked carefully for them all the way, they found none.

They returned to the ship by a different route from that which they had taken in coming, in order to see as much of the interior of the island as possible. On their way they came upon a village of albatrosses' nests. The nests were formed of little hillocks of turf, which the birds had contrived to heap up by scratching with their claws. The hillocks were hollowed in the centre to form the nest, and the cavity was lined with moss. Almost every nest was occupied by the mother bird sitting upon a single egg.

Mr. Raynal and Captain Musgrave wished to obtain some of the eggs in their nests, in order to ascertain how they would serve for food; but the birds were so tame, being "so unacquainted with man," or their maternal instincts were so strong, that it was necessary to beat them off their nests with sticks, in order to obtain the eggs. They seized in this way several of the eggs; but there was only one of the whole number that was fresh enough to be eaten. The eggs were so large, however, that Mr. Raynal said they found one egg sufficient for two persons.

After spending the day in these and similar adventures, the two explorers returned at night to the ship, very way-worn and weary, and somewhat discouraged in respect to the prospect of success in either of the branches of their undertaking. Mr. Raynal, moreover, was far from being well. The exposure and fatigue which he had endured on the voyage, while he had not yet perhaps fully recovered from the effects of his sickness at Sydney, brought on fever. He had intended to go with Captain Musgrave on a new exploring tour on the following day; but when the morning came he was too sick to leave his berth, and Aleck was taken by Captain Musgrave in his place. This sickness grew worse from day to day, and became, at length, a settled fever. He was confined by it to his berth during all the time that the vessel remained at Campbell Island, nearly four weeks. He sank, at length, so low that Captain Musgrave gave up all hopes of his recovery; and so near death did he appear at one time that the captain went on shore and selected a place for the burial of the body. This might appear, under other circumstances, to be acting with unseemly haste: but the anticipation was justifiable, and even proper under the circumstances, since in case of death on shipboard, it is necessary, both on account of the superstition of the seamen, and also for other reasons, that the remains should be disposed of without any delay.

During all the time which Mr. Raynal was confined to the cabin, Captain Musgrave, accompanied by only a number of his men, continued his exploration of the island, searching every where along the shores for coal, and thoroughly cut the interior for metallic ores. He met with very little success in respect to either of these objects. His men killed some sea-lions and obtained a certain quantity of oil. There was one sea-lion of extraordinary size, which they captured at Christmas. He was so fat that they obtained from his carcass between thirty and forty gallons of oil; and he must have weighed, they thought, about a thousand pounds. Mr. Raynal says that he once remembered and talked about this monster for a long time afterward. They called him Old Christmas, a name which they gave him in memory of the great adventure by which he was captured.

After spending nearly a month on the island in the fruitless endeavors described above, Captain Musgrave reluctantly concluded that it would be only a waste of valuable time to remain there any longer; and accordingly, after consultation with his companions, began to make preparations for their return to Sydney. They gave up all hope of finding any valuable ores; but they did manage to touch at the Auckland Islands, on their way home, in hopes of doing something more in the way of coal hunting; but in that their voyage might not have been entirely unprofitable.

The Auckland group consists of three islands, the southernmost of which is called the island of Adam, and is separated from the second island by a narrow strait, the eastern portion of which widens considerably and forms what is called Carnley Harbor. In the northern part of the main island is another harbor, which the whalemen, with the grotesque and irreverent humor so characteristic of sailors, and in reference to the harbor at Campbell Island called Abraham's Bosom, have named Sarah's Bosom. It had another name (Port Ross) given to it by higher authorities; but the seamen always preferred the name they had given it themselves.

Mr. Raynal decided to go first into Port Carnley, and as a consequence entered that cove, upon which opened the way into it, Captain Musgrave, who was standing upon the deck, seeing with his spy-glass the different portions of the shore as they successively came into view, suddenly called out to Mr. Raynal in a joyous tone, "Good news! Mr. Raynal—good news! We are going to find there what we want. I think I see plenty of seals on the rocks. Look for yourself."

So saying, and with his countenance beaming with pleasure, he handed Mr. Raynal the spy-glass. Mr. Raynal's observation confirmed that of the captain. He saw a great number of dark objects on the rocks near the water, and he had no doubt that they were seals.

In the mean time the vessel was moving rapidly onward and entering the bay.

Their course at first was toward the west, the bay opening toward the east. After going a few rods distance the bay appeared to divide into several branches, the principal one opening toward the north. There was a high, rocky promontory which partly barred the entrance to this northern branch. This they named Cape Musgrave. After rounding this cape they stood to the northward looking out for a place to anchor. They found, however, on sounding, that the water was every where extremely deep. No bottom could be found within any depth that the chain cable could reach. There were, however, two sandy beaches to be seen on any of the shores, but only ragged and naked rocks down to the edge of the water. Here and there a few small green aloes appeared in view, but it was plain that they grew on rocky ones rising above the surface of the water and covered with herbage. In a word, the whole bay, with all its branches, was evidently only a vast, irregular, and jagged chasm half filled with water, with no indications of any kind of bottom on which an anchor could take hold.

There might possibly be some places where the water was of moderate depth in the shore by the shore; but a vessel can not lie at anchor—unless moored stern and stem—very near a shore. So in the first place, when the anchor is dropped there must be room to "pay out" a considerable length of cable to allow the vessel to be down upon its side, and to cause the line of direction in which the cable pulls more or less to some so inclined as to enable the fluke to take good hold of the bottom and to keep its hold. Then, moreover, there must be room for the vessel to "swing" with the flux and reflux of the tide. So Captain Musgrave stood on as near the shore as it was safe to go, but still keeping at a certain distance from it, and sounding continually.

They went on in this way until they came to a curve of the shore on the right hand, where a second small bay open toward the west, which is marked upon the map Shipwreck Bay—a name which was afterward given to it in memory of the terrible disaster of which it was very soon the scene. For here, where they hoped to find refuge and safety for the Grafton, the unfortunate vessel was doomed to be beaten to pieces and destroyed.

On their first entering this little bay their hopes were encouraged. They had no soundings, as they came up the great bay, with a line of twenty fathoms—about one hundred and twenty feet—and with a weight of six pounds for sinker, without any success; but on entering this small bay, much to their relief, they found bottom. They at once let go their anchors, for night was coming on, and it was too late to look for any further explorations. To their great joy the anchors held. Still the position was not a safe one, for they were much too near the shore, there being scarcely room for the vessel to swing to her moorings, and the harbor was moreover open from west by south and west northwest, so that in case of a gale from that quarter they would inevitably be driven on shore, either of the cables should part. There was nothing to be done, however, but to hope for the best and trust in the morning. Fortunately the night was not to be long, for it was early in January, and the long summer days of that high latitude had just begun. They had passed under the tarpaulin as it was safe to carry, and just then a strong gust came, after letting go. Mr. Raynal into the boat, they embarked themselves. Captain Musgrave was the last to enter the boat. He had previously observed several "lines," and had fastened the end of one of them to a ring in the stern of the vessel. When he got into the boat he took his place in the stern, laying the coil of the line at his feet, and as the boat was driven from the vessel, impelled by the wind, which was blowing furiously toward the shore, he paid out the line which he had so carefully fixed from the coil. In this way the boat was eased off, so to speak, toward the land, and when he thought that he had proceeded as near to the surf, which was beating in tumultuously against the rocks, as it was safe, he stopped paying out, and belayed the line. The boat was thus held back from the breakers, by which, if she had been allowed to come on shore, she would have been immediately dashed to pieces on the rocks.

The next thing to be done, if possible, was to pass a line from the boat to the shore. The brave Alock undertook this task. He took an other line, which had been laid ready for this purpose, and fastening one end of it to the bow of the boat, and securing the other end around his body, he prepared for a favorable opportunity, and plunged into the sea.

The distance which he had to pass was not great, as the boat had only been stopped in season to prevent it being dashed against the rocks.

The difficulty and danger were only in reaching solid land. In such a sea, was extreme. Alock, however, was a powerful swimmer, as well as great courage, in encountering it; and he contrived his spring to the shore at the instant when a great wave was rolling toward it and was in strength against it, while yet there was an onward movement in the water, which bore him upon its breast to a certain point in the side of which he aimed. He reached the rock, seized and clung to it as the receding wave fell back, and left him there; and before another had time to follow he had scrambled up out of its reach. He immediately took a turn with his line around the trunk of a tree which was growing near, and Captain Musgrave cast his men on board the boat drew it "taut"—and thus a connection was fairly made with the shore.

When a sailor can once get a line across any opening or abyss which he desires to traverse by that line the difficulty is over. The sailor quent steps are all plain and easy. Captain Musgrave threw across to Alock as the rock as of light as the attached to the end of it in the boat. This end he attached to a pulley which was placed in the stern of the boat. This, that is, the one which Alock had fastened to the tree. He also fastened one end of another light line to the pulley, reaching from the shore to the boat. Thus the pulley was connected by one line with the rock on the shore, and by another with men in the boat, and by these means it could be run back and forth from the boat to the shore. The next step was for the shore to be to mount quite a steep ascent, as the boat was low in the water. Alock, therefore, stood on the shore end of the main line should be fastened at a point pretty high up, in order to be out of the reach of the waves that broke on the shore.

The men then at once commenced sending to the shore the articles which they had saved. The first thing to go was the tarpaulin. They rolled it up in as compact a form as possible, suspended it to the pulley, and sent it to shore. Alock, as soon as he received it, fastened it up under a tree, a little above the reach of the waves so as to form a kind of shelter-tent for the protection of the other articles—as they should be received—from the rain and the sea.

The other articles were sent ashore in the same manner—clothes, provisions, chests of clothing, the instruments which had been saved, and whatever else they had thought it best to bring. In this manner all were all landed it remained for the men themselves to get ashore.

This was not so feasible and so much embarrassed by the exposures and sufferings of the night to exert any strength whatever. With the selfishness which was often manifested by human beings toward each other on land, he would have left on board the boat, and abandoned to his fate. For they would have had a plausible excuse for this, under the pretense—and it would be a true pretense—that the boat would come back for him as soon as the weather made it possible for him to be taken ashore. But Captain Musgrave, who was incapable of unfaithful and true to their comrades in distress. Captain Musgrave took Mr. Raynal on his back, and caused him to be landed securely there. He then grasped the hook of the pulley with his hands, and, thus suspended, and with this load upon his shoulders, swung himself over from the boat to the shore by the boiling sea.

The end of the line on which the pulley was to run was so low, being fastened to the boat, that it was necessary to wet their feet somewhat, but it aided them in keeping on the surface, and Alock pulled lastily at the other end of the small line so as gradually to draw them in. It was an herculean task, for the weight of the men as "ragged" the rope so much at the end near the boat as to make the ascent for the pulley at the shore end very steep. Alock pulled till he had brought them up this ascent as far as he could. For a moment the result trembled in the balance. Alock could draw them up no higher, and the captain's strength was nearly exhausted, while the surging sea was buffeting him and them close to the rocks. Alock hastily fastened his end of the line to a tree near by, and, with extreme haste, reaching and pulling the two men in turn, until Captain Musgrave could get hold of the rocks himself, and, with the aid of the little strength that Mr. Raynal retained, they all three succeeded in reaching a place where they could hold on safely. The breaker had come surging up around them, and spent its strength without being able to dislodge them.

Captain Musgrave and Alock half led and half carried Mr. Raynal up to where the tarpaulin had been spread, and sheltered him as well as he well as they could, while they went back to aid in bringing the other men to shore. This was not at all difficult. One after another the men grasped the hook of the pulley, and plunged into the surging sea. Captain Musgrave had done, and were pulled to the shore. This was comparatively easy, for the two land in each case only went half as great, while the force on shore to pull upon the line, and to aid the men in getting upon the rocks, was doubled for the double load, and trebled for the second. They left the boat where she was, secured by the two lines, one running to the ship, and the other to the shore.

They gathered around the tarpaulin which covered their heap of their effects, and decided some little protection for the sick man, though the others were entirely exposed to the cold and to the rain. The object of first necessity was to secure a fire, and the next to find, if possible, some more substantial shelter. Alock, for this, as it happened, had some matches in his pocket, but the others had not. These were lines, one running to the ship, and the other to the shore.

The object of first necessity was to secure a fire, and the next to find, if possible, some more substantial shelter. Alock, for this, as it happened, had some matches in his pocket, but the others had not. These would only be of a single, after several trials, they succeeded with one of them; and having with great difficulty found something that would burn, at last accomplished their object of making a fire. They kindled it by means of some tolerably dry sticks of wood which Mr. Harris, the Englishman, had under the big trunk of a fallen tree. As soon as the fire began to burn they went to work collecting all the dead wood that they could find, and piled it in a heap near at hand; for it was of importance to secure that they should have time the fire to go out, as their last match was gone.

They had now a fire, and could dry their shoes, and among their stores they had a moderate supply of tea. The first thing that they did was to make some tea. They had a little bread, which one of the men discovered not far off, and to make some tea. This they drank, and then ate it in some pieces of ship biscuit, of which they also had a small quantity among their stores.

They were now greatly refreshed by tea, and then, after remaining to warm themselves a little more, they left Mr. Raynal by the side of the fire, while the rest went off in various directions to see if they could not find some cleam in the rocks or some sheltering cliff, or, if not, some dense thicket in the woods, where they might obtain a temporary shelter.

While they were gone and Mr. Raynal sat alone watching the fire—which, as he said, sadly, was all that he was good for—he heard some sad within him to think of the terrible extremity to which he had been brought. "I thought," said he, "that I was a man, and kindred to you, who had always been very dear to me, and whom I seemed to love with a double tenderness and affection. I felt that I was separated from them by half the distance round the world. When they were with me, I felt as if I never hope to escape from this islet, lost in the middle of unknown seas, and beyond the limits of the habitable globe?' My soul sank under these reflections to an inexpressible bitterness of despair. My heart swelled within me till it seemed as if I should suffocate. Tears which I could not repress came rushing to my eyes, and I wept bitterly. I then thought of God, and remembered that He was all-powerful, and that He directed and controlled every thing in the material and moral world. I fell on my knees upon the wet ground, and implored Him to help me. He would assist His aid to me, and my companions in misfortune, and save us from an impending fate.

Mr. Raynal derived some comfort from his prayer, and returned to the fire. He dragged himself as well as he could to the bough with the kettle, which he filled with water, and then put it over the fire, in order to have tea ready for his companions on their return. They came back in about an hour, looking weary, disappointed, and sorrowful. They had been unable to find any sort of shelter whatever. They dirably disheartened and discouraged; they sat down as close to each other as they could before the fire, pulled as much of the tarpaulin as could be spared, without too much uncovering their stores as close to each other as they could, to give themselves up to utter despair. George and Harry said that they had seen no signs of life scattered in the waves. Captain Musgrave, whose manly resolution, coolness, and self-reliance had been the main source of hopefulness for the courage of the men hitherto, was silent, but he covered his face with his hands, and Mr. Raynal observed that he did so to hide his tears. He was thinking of the wife and children at Sydney, to whom he was tenderly attached, and whom he had left reluctantly, and with a loving farewell, on the commencement of the voyage. Mr. Raynal attempted to encourage the men by reminding them of the arrangement which had been made with the captain of the vessel, that, in case of their not returning to the ship, they should proceed to the other end of the island, and there wait for the vessel to return. This, he said, would be in a few days, and they could then be taken off.

Alock pulled lastily at the other end of the small line so as gradually to draw them in. It was an herculean task, for the weight of the men as "ragged" the rope so much at the end near the boat as to make the ascent for the pulley at the shore end very steep. They were now greatly refreshed by tea, and then, after remaining to warm themselves a little more, they left Mr. Raynal by the side of the fire, while the rest went off in various directions to see if they could not find some cleam in the rocks or some sheltering cliff, or, if not, some dense thicket in the woods, where they might obtain a temporary shelter.

While they were gone and Mr. Raynal sat alone watching the fire—which, as he said, sadly, was all that he was good for—he heard some sad within him to think of the terrible extremity to which he had been brought. "I thought," said he, "that I was a man, and kindred to you, who had always been very dear to me, and whom I seemed to love with a double tenderness and affection. I felt that I was separated from them by half the distance round the world. When they were with me, I felt as if I never hope to escape from this islet, lost in the middle of unknown seas, and beyond the limits of the habitable globe?' My soul sank under these reflections to an inexpressible bitterness of despair. My heart swelled within me till it seemed as if I should suffocate. Tears which I could not repress came rushing to my eyes, and I wept bitterly. I then thought of God, and remembered that He was all-powerful, and that He directed and controlled every thing in the material and moral world. I fell on my knees upon the wet ground, and implored Him to help me. He would assist His aid to me, and my companions in misfortune, and save us from an impending fate.

Mr. Raynal derived some comfort from his prayer, and returned to the fire. He dragged himself as well as he could to the bough with the kettle, which he filled with water, and then put it over the fire, in order to have tea ready for his companions on their return. They came back in about an hour, looking weary, disappointed, and sorrowful. They had been unable to find any sort of shelter whatever. They dirably disheartened and discouraged; they sat down as close to each other as they could before the fire, pulled as much of the tarpaulin as could be spared, without too much uncovering their stores as close to each other as they could, to give themselves up to utter despair. George and Harry said that they had seen no signs of life scattered in the waves. Captain Musgrave, whose manly resolution, coolness, and self-reliance had been the main source of hopefulness for the courage of the men hitherto, was silent, but he covered his face with his hands, and Mr. Raynal observed that he did so to hide his tears. He was thinking of the wife and children at Sydney, to whom he was tenderly attached, and whom he had left reluctantly, and with a loving farewell, on the commencement of the voyage. Mr. Raynal attempted to encourage the men by reminding them of the arrangement which had been made with the captain of the vessel, that, in case of their not returning to the ship, they should proceed to the other end of the island, and there wait for the vessel to return. This, he said, would be in a few days, and they could then be taken off.

The men who had made this promise, he said, were men of honor, and they would not fail of their engagement. In the mean time they must do what they could, he added, to preserve their lives until the rescue should come.

These words revived the courage of the men in a certain degree; and after some consultation they determined to make an attempt to get to the boat, and by means of it to go on board the vessel, to see if they could not procure some sails and cordage, and, also, perhaps, some boats, by means of which they might put up some kind of tent to furnish them with a temporary habitation — leaving Mr. Hayard, as before, to take charge of the fire. The mere idea of doing something revived their drooping spirits very sensibly, and they all felt a good will. Indeed, the best remedy in all cases for overwhelming sorrow and despondency, from whatever cause, is to find something to do, and to go to work vigorously in doing it.

A PRAIRIE-DOG VILLAGE.

THIS little creature, sometimes known by the name of the "wish-ton-wish," is a rodent, and not a carnivorous animal. The reason of its popular name lies in the short yelping sound which it is fond of uttering, and which bears some resemblance to the bark of a young puppy. It is a pretty and rather curious animal, about sixteen inches in length, and of a yellowish-red color. It lives in very populous villages, of one of which we give a faithful illustration on page 437. The holes common in these villages are of considerable dimensions, and are dug in a sloping direction, at an angle of about forty-five degrees with the horizon. After descending two or three yards they make a sudden turn upward, and terminate in a spacious chamber.

The prairie-dog shares its subterranean home with the burrowing owl and the rattlesnake. It was once supposed that these tenants and the dogs were associated together in perfect harmony, forming a natural happy family circle. For ground. Recent discoveries have dispelled this pleasant theory, and shown that both the rattlesnake and the owl abuse the hospitality of their four-footed neighbors by devouring their young.

The scene presented by one of these dog villages is very curious. The prairie-dog is no less inquisitive than timid. On the approach of an intruder, the little creature gives a sharp yelp of alarm, and dives into its burrow, its example being at once followed by all its neighbors. For an instant the village appears to be deserted; but soon their curiosity gets the better of their prudence, and their inquisitive little noses are seen protruding from their burrows, to ascertain the cause of the alarm, a curiosity which often costs them dear. The prairie-dog is remarkably tenacious of life, and unless shot in the head is sure to escape into its hole.

SHOE-BUCKLES AND SHOE-STRINGS.

WE find buckles connected with foot-gear as early as the fourteenth century, the shoes of a skeleton of that period, exhumed in 1348, bearing marks of having been fastened in this fashion; and buckles appear upon the long-peaked shoes of Robert Attelath (who died in 1376). During the earlier part of the Tudor times enormous ribbons and roses were all the rage as shoe decorations, the white favors of York having outlived the liking of Fortune, and thereby fore of Fashion too; but long before Catherine Mary ruled the land, buckles were worn by all classes, the "upper circles" wearing silver and copper gilt, while less well-to-do folks sported copper buckles in their shoes. In one of the Church Homilies set forth in Edward VI.'s time there is a quotation from the third chapter of Matthew, making the Baptist say he was not worthy to unbuckle the Savior's shoes, the passage being rendered in the authorized version of the Bible, "Whose shoes I am not worthy to bear," although, in the accounts of the other Evangelists, we find it given, "Whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose"—a change of word expressive of the change of fashion which took place in the reign of the first Stuart, when Herrick sang of

"A curious shoe-string in whose true lace and beaux delighted in double silk laces, with silver flings and tags; while the use of point or linen were worn by less extravagant dressers; and the commonalty held there was nothing like leather for a shoe-fastener.

When Charles II. came to take his ease upon the throne, buckles came into vogue, and those with Puritans, who prided themselves upon sumptuary simplicity. Buckles held their own nearly through the eighteenth century, and at the commencement, short-quartered, square-toed shoes, with high red heels and small buckles, were considered the proper foot-gear for gentlemen; and the ladies, not to be outdone, fastened their clogs with silver buckles, ornamented with paste or stones. In the then North American colonies the fashion of the mother-country was closely imitated, and a man would not have been allowed to remain in a ball-room if he ventured to put his foot there without a buckle; in fact, no one would have shocked the company as much as M. Roland did the court of Louis XVI., when the hurtled master of the ceremonies exclaimed, "O dear! he has no buckles to his shoes!" and was comforted by Dumourier's sympathizing reply, "Oh! shocking! we shall all be ruined and undone!" At home, the buckle assumed every shape fancy could suggest or extravagance devise; wealthy fashionables decorated their feet with diamonds, bumbler imitators wore paste. The ladies were such large square buckles that it was said to be sufficient to uncover their feet to display the enormous silver or silver-plated shields they carried. In the days when "Straw! straw! straw! every thing is ornamented with straw, from the cap to the shoe-buckle!" giving the would-be wits an opportunity for the perpetration of jokes more pertinent than polite. The era of buckles was, however, drawing to a close: in 1789 shoestrings began to appear in morning costumes, and by degrees they ousted buckles from their place.

This was an innovation of dire consequence in some quarters. The manufacture of the longreigning buckle had grown into an important one, particularly in London, Birmingham, Walsall, and Wolverhampton, employing in the last three places some twenty thousand hands. The National Shoestring Act was the reason of the growth of "the most ridiculous of all ridiculous fashions, the effeminate shoestring," which for a great alarm among those whose bread depended upon the threatened manufacture. In 1792 the leaders of the trade determined to try and stem the influence of the First Gentleman in Europe in their behalf. A deputation from the Midlands went up to London and were introduced to the Prince of Wales by Sheridan. They represented that although the prince's interest had been cherished by parliamentary assistance, they did not ask for prohibition of the obnoxious shoestrings, but merely desired the personal interference of his Royal Highness, fearing that if the stagnation of trade, caused by the introduction of shoe-strings and slippers, continued, "miseries, indigations, and bloody business" consequences must inevitably ensue." Mr. Sheridan lauded their petition, declaring he had rarely met with sentences containing so much meaning, briefly expressed in a few words, as the following: "We pray your honor to observe, that the country, instead of foreign or unprofitable ornaments, wears and consumes the manufactures of this country, she gives on a decent simple form, and therefore is patriotism. When Isaac, at the same time and by the same means also presented the petition against the rich, clothes and fills the naked and hungry poor, she deserves a worthier appellation, and may be called benevolence." He urged his client, but your Royal Highness will prefer the blessings of the starving manufacturer to the encomiums of the drawing-room. Where is the use of a prince to address Fashion herself. She is void of feelings, and deaf to every sound; but, certainly, she is subject to your control. She has been accustomed to listen to your voice, and obey your commands." Similar petitions were made to the Dukes of York and Clarence, and the buckleshakers could not complain of want of influence. The Prince of Wales ordered the principal officers of his household into his presence, and told them they must from that moment discard the use of shoe-strings; while he expressed the hope that they would never afterward be missing an important an article of British manufacture.

The buckle-makers of London and Westminster followed in the stepped footsteps of provincial brethren, by publishing an appeal to the public, complaining that, however unwelcome it might to them, they were effectually the appearance of shoe-strings, the wearing of them still increased, and hoping that the influence of the Metropolitan friend to his country would, by following an evil example, virtually take part in snatching the bread out of the mouths of thousands of beneficence ranging each distinction with its inherent brightness, they requested the Duke of Kent, his son, and other distinguished members of the royal family, to wear shoe-buckles. Fashion doing an incredible trade abroad, and certainly prior to his Royal Highness's encouraging shoe-strings, "both militarily and domestically." The fates of persons have often been determined by the trifles on which they spent the prime of their youth and manhood, entered into connections, accepted and declined offers of marriage, and left having this trade for a dependence. Their hearts bleeding at the cruel inconsiderate consequences of Fashion's edicts, and their pocketbooks rise in quick succession to defeat the probability of fixing on any other branch of employment. The imperial tie, pitiably relaxed by reiterated sorrows; the children cry louder and more piteously for food; the husband remonstrates, his wronted courage fails; the wife, more delicately sensible, is the more severely hurt by the reproaching woes which crowd upon her mind. Few friends before: less than ever now! The friends of worldly fortune fall off most basely, often reminded of their bereaved trade, and no philosopher's stone to smooth the passage to honor! Now spread wide the happy cause, the prospect changes. Hope, with cheering looks, advances a better time: a time to watch the progress of our appeal to your Royal Highness. Instantly happiness flies from house to house, each other have so glorious a source of expectation! Hope, with magic power, appeased their hunger, removed their misery, shakes the insensible torturer's heart dance with joy; and the Duke and Duchess of York echoed in their cups, toast after toast. And your petitioners will ever pray."

The result of all this was that buckles were unanimously prevalent at the Queen's birthday drawing-room, held soon afterward, when the beauty and brilliancy of the buckles worn by the Prince of Wales, the Duke of York, and the Earl of Fife attracted general notice and admiration. It was but a transient triumph. Royalty failed to control Fashion; and although accordingly court buckles were occasionally seen until the 1830, their fate was sealed, and by 1812 the buckle was extinct.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE Fourth of July will bring, this year, the usual amount of cracking, snapping, fizzling, and firing. We infer this from the fact that not far from one hundred and eighty thousand boxes of small Chinese crackers have been imported, and over 800,000 pounds of larger sizes. Every variety of fire-works are now manufactured in this country, with the single exception of crackers; and these are imported from China much cheaper than they can be made here. Torpedoes are made by millions, mostly on Long Island, by German farmers during their long winter evenings. Small as the business is, it pays, although the loads of five different persons in the process of manufacture. An Italian member of the municipal body of fire-works are manufactured, sold, and burned up every year. The effeminate shoestring no larger kinds are equally popular. Many original designs are offered to the public every season, and those "exhibition pieces" are often exceedingly dense and elaborate. So many novelties are this year offered for sale, that those who desire to display their aptitudes by inventing a new thing of the kind, will be sorely puzzled in their choice. And also! for those who love of country would show itself in quietness! We fear they will find no rest for the sole of their foot in Gordon Pearls."

The city of Boston has given to the Trustees of the "Museum of Fine Arts" a lot of land containing nearly a hundred thousand square feet, and valued at a quarter of a million of dollars. It is situated at the corner of Dartmouth and St. James streets. It was proposed to take three hundred thousand dollars from the existing fund, for the purpose of erecting a building, but another plan is called for. A large proportion of this sum has already been raised. The Museum now has several valuable artistic collections.

The latest fad among the gilded youth of Paris is the wearing on the left arm of a bracelet, composed of a number of gold rings, each bearing the name of a mistress. The more mistresses a man has, the more rings he wears. Some young men of fashion have already been compelled to have a second bracelet made to receive the rings that will not find room on the first.

THE UNITED STATES.

Among the paintings in the French Exhibition this year none has attracted more attention than the work of which we give an engraving on this page—an allegorical representation of the United States of North America, painted by M. A. Yvon for Mr. A. T. Stewart. Thirty-four States appear in this composition, grouped around the symbolic figure of the Republic, whose hand rests in that of Washington. On the left is a group of immigrants just landing from Europe, in the costumes, and with the industrial implements, of their native countries.

One of our great rivers is represented as extinguishing in its current the torch of war, while our illustrious forefathers burst their tombs to salute the triumph of the cause to which they consecrated their lives. On the right, sanguinary traces represent the past. Archangels beat down the evil passions of war and domestic discord among the States. From the darkness of ignorance and superstition the colored races emerge into the light of knowledge and civilization—the Indians in the back-ground shading their eyes from the dazzling radiance, and the negroes emancipated and instructed by the whites.

On a rich tapestry in the immediate fore-ground, covered with fruits and flowers, are grouped the geniuses of Peace and Industry. A number of heralds about the statue of Washington proclaim to the four quarters of the globe the glory of the nation which he established.

The picture has been very severely criticised by European critics, and the Paris correspondents of some American newspapers have made it the subject of unsparing ridicule. But, while it must be admitted that the subject is one that offers better facilities for a Latin school composition than for artistic treatment, it can not be denied that the picture is the work of a man of genius, and bears the mark of a thoughtful and cultivated mind. It is somewhat singular that M. Yvon should have dressed in the Confederate gray uniform the soldier who is assisting the negro to rise. We are curious to know whether this was accidental or intentional.

It is the intention of Mr. Stewart to place this painting in his magnificent gallery in this city.

THE TREASURE STONES.

It was Christmas-eve in a small farm in the neighborhood of Ploubinec, beyond Hennebont.

No one was at house; the master, mistress, children, and servants were all gone to midnight mass. The sound of church bells was still heard across the heath, now covered with a thin layer of snow. Only an old woman, too old and infirm to go to church, was sitting up beside the fire.

A beggar was in the stable, asleep between a lean ox that drew the little plow and an old ass, worn out with carrying bundles of heather or of rushes dried in the sun. The poor man had strolled the farm after the departure of the farmer, and the old woman had given him a cake of black bread and a cup of milk, and then allowed him to go to bed in the stable.

He slept peacefully till he was awakened by voices near him. He listened, thinking it was the people of the farm come home; but he soon perceived, to his amazement, that the ox and the ass beside him were conversing in good Breton. The ass had turned toward the ox, who was reposing on his litter; and the beggar Scriven remembered he had heard it said by old people that, in memory of the hospitality shown by the ox and the ass to the infant Jesus, once a year, at midnight on Christmas-eve, the inhabitants of the stable were endowed with the gift of speech, and were able to converse about their affairs like human beings.

Scriven was sharp and clever. It was not for nothing that he had carried his wallet from parish to parish, making capital of his broken leg, and living as a beggar on the charity of kind folks. He did not make the least movement that might betray his presence, lest he should silence his bed-fellows, whose conversation he was so eager to hear.

The ox was saying to the ass, "One never does what one wants to do. If I were not tied here, I would go and take a walk on the heath, that I might be at liberty for once; and if I met Blanchik the plowman of Plavigner, I would tell him something."

"What would you tell him?" asked the ass, who seemed depressed by bad treatment.

"Ah, you don't like Benedik as I do. He does not drive you; and that good-for-nothing Kaolo has given you so many blows that you can hardly stand any more. But the master has never had such a plowman as Benedik. He talks to me as if I were a Christian; and if he pricks me at all when I go too slow, it is so gently that I scarcely feel it. He is always afraid of doing harm, and has no wish but to do good. If he looks often toward Marichik, it is no wonder, for he wants to make her his wife. If he only knew—! He would soon be rich enough to buy the farm, the furniture, and all the land; and the master, instead of snubbing him, would stand before him cap in hand."

Scriven began to listen with all his ears; and the ass, who was lying on his litter of leather, turned himself languidly round.

"You mean that you want him to find the treasure that the Stones of Plouhinec will have uncovered one of these days? By the stable of St. Joseph, if he had the cross-wort and the five-leaved clover, they would be of some use to him when the Stones go down to drink at the Laval! But it happens only once in a hundred years, and he will know nothing about it.

"Besides," rejoined the ox, "if there can not be found in these parts a baptized Christian who will give his life for him, he will be crushed by the Stones when they come back. But, after all, he would never let another be killed for him, and the good God will show him some other way of becoming rich enough to marry Marichik."

The ass had fallen asleep, and all was again silent in the stable. Scriven alone was awake, with a terrible temptation gnawing at his heart. Why should he not profit by the knowledge of the existence of this treasure, which had just been revealed to him in so strange a manner? He was tired of begging. It was no longer the good trade that it used to be; the times were hard, and although charitable people might still give the beggar the best place in the chimney corner, and the largest piece of bread, ill-natured folks often let him wait at the door, and after all threw him only a dry crust. He knew very well where to find the magical herbs—in the way as you go from the sea-coast toward the country where it never freezes, where the myrtles are in flower in winter, and violets open in February in the woods. Scriven stopped, however, in his meditations when he came to the last condition of the great enterprise. Where was he to find a baptized Christian who would give his life for him?

He did not yet dare to ask himself aloud how he should delude any one, and allure him to his death. But the devil had already suggested dark schemes to him. The treasure glittered before poor Scriven's greedy eyes. He fancied he saw handfuls of gold, diamonds, and large bags of silver, and between sleeping and waking he gave himself up to these dangerous dreams. After he was quite asleep the master and mistress, with their children and servants, returned from church.

When he woke in the morning he saw Benedik, who was arranging the litters of the animals. He did not know him, but the caresses he bestowed on the ox from time to time, as well as the sweet words he exchanged in low tones with Marichik, who was helping her mother in the kitchen, induced him to examine the plowman more carefully. Wickedness had already established itself in Scriven's heart. When he left the farm about mid-day his wallet was well furnished. He looked forward to the Stones of Plouhinec, which stood out in the snow irregular and clear, like a troop of soldiers standing still upon the field of battle. He contemplated them for a minute; then he went back to take another look at Benedik, and at last plunged into the heath, walking in the direction of the sea.

THE UNITED STATES OF NORTH AMERICA.

Three or four days had passed, and the short winter's day had begun to close. The ground was still covered with snow, and the ox ruminated softly in the stable, blessing Heaven that had wrapped the earth in a white shroud.

No work could be done, and Benedik, whistling gayly in spite of the growing darkness, was striking one of the largest of the stones of Plouhinec with a chisel and hammer. The poor fellow was not, however, really gay, for the mistress, who had observed that Marichik liked to talk to him, had warned her husband, who at once gave the Plavigner lad notice to leave. When Benedik asked the cause of this abrupt dismissal, the master answered that in twenty-four hours he would think of speaking to it.

On this poor Benedik had not more than received his wages at for the dances he had danced at the "Round" his offering on the altar like a good Christian.

To console himself Benedik, with the chisel in the big stone, when he heard a voice beside him.

"What are you Scriven; and Benedik as if the other had earth. "Does not drawings on the stone

"The master has he has done," replied fiful, and he was serious tone. "I am going self than I want, and find work. I am sure of my own master days these stones flow in the devil's harm now for this one to bear on it the sign of the Cross."

And Benedik quietly finished his work, completing the cross he had begun to cut upon the stone.

"Listen to me," said the beggar, in a low voice. "What would you give me if I were to make you rich enough to marry Mariemik tomorrow if you like, or even to look elsewhere and higher if you have a mind to do so?"

Benedik's tools dropped from his hands. "Rich," he gasped, in a choking voice; "Mariemik!" He was so much excited that he could not find words, but he looked eagerly at the beggar, make me rich enough to obtain Mariemik from her father," he cried, "you may take all the rest; you shall have my gratitude into the bargain, and my services by day and by night, in fair weather or foul; except Mariemik and my hope of heaven, I will refuse you nothing that you can ask of me."

Scriven smiled; but it was dark by this time, and, besides, Benedik was too happy and too trustful to comprehend the look of troubled joy that passed over the face of his companion.

"I will stay here and watch beside the Stones," said the beggar. "I have something in my gourd which will keep out the cold. You have still a little bread left, and a piece of cheese. Eat and drink, and then go back to supper, and when you look at Mariemik say to yourself that to-morrow she will be yours if our enterprise succeeds; and then at eleven o'clock come back here to me."

Scriven was eager to get rid of Benedik, for the young man's gratitude weighed upon his mind till his remorse was insupportable. "It must be," he kept repeating to himself; "and he is such a good Christian that he will go straight to heaven."

Benedik found it very difficult to conceal his joy; in the darkest moment of his grief a strange hope had risen before him. Mariemik looked at him in amazement; she had blushed when during that day her mother had said in her hearing that Benedik was about to leave them to seek his fortune elsewhere, but she had bravely restrained her tears, waiting till she was alone to weep. Now, however, the joy that she read in Benedik's face almost overcame her courage. Was he then so happy to go away from her?

Scriven had desired him, above all things, to keep their secret; but it was well that it was for so short a time, or Benedik would never have been able to be silent when he saw Mariemik and looks. He stood for a moment before the crucifix and repeated a prayer; then turning to her determined to be revenged on all who had ever slighted or repulsed him.

From time to time he glanced at his companion, who sang in a low voice some verses of a Christmas hymn, or repeated a prayer. Benedik was a little uneasy at what he was about to do; and he commended himself to God, to the Holy Virgin, and to his guardian angel, that he might be preserved from the wiles of the devil, who had doubtless in former days hidden this treasure over which the Stones of Plouhinec kept watch.

Scriven at last desired him to be quiet. "No one knows," said he, "who may be listening to you." But Benedik prayed more fervently than ever in his heart; for it seemed to him that all the elves and sprites of the heath were dancing round him.

At last twelve o'clock struck; the church was a long way off, but the twelve strokes sounded clearly across the long stretch of bare fields, now covered with snow.

Scriven had risen up, and roughly drawn his companion out of the shadow of the Stones. As the last strokes died away they began to stir, loosening themselves by a violent effort from the earth in which they were embedded; they swayed about and leaned against each other like tipsy men; then springing forward irregularly they rushed away together in the direction of the river, bounding over the frozen earth, and in their passage crushing the slender birches on the heath and the great clusters of reeds like wisps of straw.

Scriven seized Benedik's arm. "Come," he said, in a voice so hoarse that no one would have recognized it; and they both ran to the place where the Stones had stood. The ground was plowed up as if by bomb-shells on a battle-field, and in every hole were seen gold and silver and precious stones.

Benedik was so dazzled that he would have stood still to gaze at them, but Scriven forced him to stoop and pick up some of the treasure. "Take all you can," he whispered; "they will be back immediately."

As he spoke he filled all the empty bags that he had brought in his beggar's wallet. Benedik also stuffed the gold into his pockets, and both his hands were full when a loud and terrible noise made him start up suddenly.

"The Stones!" he cried; and they were in fact rushing back again even faster than they had run away, as if they were in a hurry to return to their places and to the treasures over which they watched. As they advanced they formed themselves into an immense circle, and Benedik saw at a glance that they were surrounded.

"We are lost!" he cried.

"Not I," said the beggar, drawing from his breast the cross-wort and the five-leaved clover that it had cost him so much trouble to find on the seashore. "The Stones of Plouhinec never harm any one who carries these plants with him. I must have a baptized Christian to stay here after I have carried off the treasure, and I expect this favor from you," he said, with a diabolical laugh.

The Stones turned aside as he presented the magic plants to them, and, forming themselves again into a column behind the largest one, they advanced directly upon Benedik, who had fallen on his knees in an agony of terror.

The beggar by this time had shut up his bags, and was preparing to fly.

In less time than it has taken to tell, the terrible battalion had reached the plowman of Plevigner, but at sight of him the largest stone stood suddenly still; it bore the sign of the Cross, and could do no harm to a Christian. Benedik was still on his knees, confusedly murmuring prayers mingled with the name of Mariemik, when the great stone placed itself in front of him like a rampart, and protected him with its enormous size; and the rest, separating, rolled into their places, once more hiding from human gaze those treasures on which rash eyes had ventured to look for a time.

Scriven meanwhile found the gold that he had collected press so heavily on his shoulders that he threw away his bags, losing some other time to come back and look for them. His only thought now was how to save his life, for when the large stone had accomplished its work of protection it began to roll back like the others into its place; the beggar was in front of it, and, though it held up the magic plants in his trembling hands, it had no power over the stone on which the sign of the Cross was carved. It rolled on, and left the miserable man behind it, crushed to death under its weight. His horror-stricken companion, appalled by the sight, fell forward insensible on the ground.

Benedik appeared the next morning at the farm-house loaded with gold, and staggering under the weight of the bags he had picked up on the heath; but he had grown ten years older, and it was only after many years of happiness with Mariemik and his children that he ceased to tremble when he heard the clock strike twelve at midnight.

"I know," said Scriven, "that these Stones, and he touched the large one on which Benedik had just cut the sign of the Cross, "will this very night tear themselves up from the ground on which they rest, and go to drink at the river Inlet. Under them is hidden a treasure so great that no eye has ever seen the like. A single person would never be able to carry it off before the stones come back to their place; but, if you will help me, I swear by your patron saint that you shall never again need to bow your head to any man."

Benedik seized the beggar's hands in his, not noticing how they trembled. "If you will only take one more look at the young girl, he went out to the table, where he could hide his agitation and his hopes; he caressed the ox, who looked up at the sound of his voice; and then, before it was quite eleven o'clock, he went back to look for Scriven at the Stones of Plouhinec.

The beggar seemed almost benumbed with the cold, and scarcely spoke. The voice of conscience, which he had tried to stifle so often during these two days, was now at last silenced in his heart. Dreams of riches, pleasure, and greatness filled his thoughts; he felt no desire to reward those who had been kind to him; but

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-SECOND.

THE APPARITION.

THE night had advanced. It was close on twelve o'clock, when Anne heard a man's voice, outside her bedroom door, asking leave to speak with her for a moment.

"What is it?"

"The gentleman down stairs wishes to see you, ma'am."

"Do you mean Mr. Delamayn's brother?"

"Yes."

"Where is Mr. Delamayn?"

"Out in the garden, ma'am."

Anne went down stairs, and found Julius alone in the drawing-room.

"I am sorry to disturb you," he said. "I am afraid of being ill. The landlady has gone to bed, I am told—and I don't know where to apply for medical assistance. Do you happen to know any doctor in the neighborhood?"

Anne, like Julius, was a perfect stranger to the neighborhood. She suggested making inquiry of the servant. On speaking to the girl, it turned out that she knew of a medical man living within ten minutes' walk of the cottage. She could give plain directions enabling any person to find the house—but she was not certain that hour of the night and in that lonely neighborhood, to go out by herself.

"Is he seriously ill?" Anne asked.

"He is in such a state of nervous irritability," said Julius, "that he can't remain still for two moments together in the same place. It began with incessant restlessness while he was reading here. I persuaded him to go to bed. He couldn't lie still for an instant—he came down again, burning with fever, and more restless than ever. He is out in the garden in spite of every thing I could do to prevent him. He says he says to 'run it off.' It appears to be serious to me. Come and judge for yourself."

He led Anne into the next room; and, opening the shutter, pointed to the garden.

The window looked out; the night was fine. The clear starlight showed Geoffrey, stripped to his shirt and drawers, running round and round the garden. He apparently believed himself to be contending at the fullest foot-race. At times, as the wide figure circled rapidly round in the starlight, they heard him cheering for "the South." The slackening thump of his feet on the ground, the heavier and heavier panting in which he drew his breath, as he passed the window, gave warning that his strength was failing him. Julius, if he led to no worse consequences, would force him to return to the house. In the state of his brain and his nerves, who could say what the result might be, if medical help was not called in?

"I will go for the doctor," said Julius, "if you don't mind my leaving you."

It was impossible for Anne to set my apprehensions of her own against the plain necessity for summoning assistance. They found the key of the gate in the pocket of Geoffrey's coat up stairs. Anne went with Julius to let him out.

"How can I thank you?" she said, gratefully.

"What should I have done without you?"

"I won't be a moment longer than I can help," he answered, and left her.

She secured the gate again, and went back to the cottage. The servant met her in the hall, and proposed calling up Hester Detbridge.

"We don't know what the master may do while his brother is away," said she. "And one more of us isn't one too many, when we are only women in the house."

"You are quite right," said Anne. "Wake your mistress."

After ascending the stairs, they looked out into the garden, through the window at the end of the passage on the upper floor. He was still going round and round, but very slowly: his pace was fast slackening to a walk.

Anne went back to her room, and waited near the open door—ready to close and fasten it instantly if any thing occurred to alarm her. "How changed I am!" she thought, to herself. "Every thing frightens me, now."

The interval was the natural one—but not the true one. The change was not in herself, but in the situation in which she was placed. Her position during the investigation at Lady Lundie's house had tried her moral courage only. It had exacted from her none of those noble efforts of self-sacrifice which the highest forces in a woman's nature are especially capable of making. Her position at the cottage tried her physical courage: it called on her to rise superior to the sense of actual bodily danger—while that danger was lurking in the dark. There, the woman's nature made her what she was. Said on it—there, her courage could strike no root in the strength of her love—there, the natural instincts were the instincts appealed to: and the firmness wanted was the firmness of a man.

Hester Detbridge's door opened. She walked straight into Anne's room.

The yellow clay-cold color of her face showed a faint flush of warmth; its deathlike stillness was stirred by a touch of life. The stony eyes, fixed as ever in their gaze, shone strangely with a dim inner lustre. Her gray hair, so neatly arranged at other times, was in disorder under her cap. All her movements were quicker than usual. Something had roused the stagnant vitality in the woman—it was working in her mind; it was forcing itself outward into her face. The servants at Windygates, in past times, had seen these signs, and had known them for a warning to leave Hester Detbridge to herself.

Anne asked her if she had heard what had happened.

She bowed her head.

"I hope you haven't mind being disturbed?"

She wrote on her slate: "I'm glad to be disturbed. I have been dreaming bad dreams. It's good for me to be wakened, when sleep takes me backward in my life. What's wrong with him? Frightened?"

"Yes."

She wrote again, and pointed toward the garden with one hand, while she held the slate up with the other: "Frightened of him?"

"Terribly frightened."

She wrote for the third time, and offered the slate to Anne with a ghastly smile. "I have been through it all. I know. You've only at the beginning now. He'll put the wrinkles in your face, and the gray in your hair. There will come a time when you'll wish yourself dead and buried. You will live through it, for all that. Ah, and when!"

As she read the last three words, Anne heard the sound of the garden door below opened and closed again. She caught Hester Detbridge by the arm, and hurriedly led her toward the window. Suggesting heavily in the passage, gave token of his approach to the stairs. He was talking to himself, still possessed by the delusion that he was at the foot-race. "Five to four on Delamayn. Delamayn's own. Three cheers for the north, and three more. Devilish long race. Night already! Ferry! where's Ferry?"

He advanced, staggering from side to side of the passage. The stairs below creaked as he set his foot on them. Hester Detbridge suddenly released her from Anne, advanced, with her candle in her hand, and threw open Geoffrey's bedroom door. Returning to the head of the stairs and stood there, firm as a rock, waiting for him. He looked up, as he set his foot on the first step, and saw the figure of Hester Dethridge, brightly illuminated by the candle, looking down at him. He stopped, stooped, moved his head like a dog on which he stood. "Ghost! witch! devil!" He he cried out, "take your eyes off me!" He struck at her, as her footsteps were set on the stairs, sprang back into the hall—and shut himself up in the dining-room. A sound like the low, organic which had seized him once already in the kitchen-garden at Windygates, under the eyes of the dumb creature that fastened on him now for once more. Frightened—absolutely frightened at Hester Detbridge!

The gate-bell rang. Julius had returned with the doctor.

Anne gave the key to the girl to let them in. Hester wrote on her slate, as composedly as if nothing had happened: "I'll go to bed, and to sleep again, looking over into the hall below. Open the passage, looking over into the hall below. Open your bedroom door, and tell the doctor to go to him." The landlady is in the kitchen, if you want her." She returned to her room, and waited for what might happen next.

After a brief interval she heard the drawing-room door open, and the voices of the men outside. There ensued a pause—and then the unresounding Geoffrey to ascend the stairs; he persisted in declaring that Hester Detbridge was waiting for him at the top of them. After a little they persuaded him that the way was free. Anne heard them enter the bedroom, and close his bedroom door.

Another and a longer interval passed before the door opened again. The doctor was going away. He said his parting words to Julius in the passage. "I have left a draught with him, through the night, and give him another dose of the sedative powder if he wakes. He is likely to thing to be alarmed about in the restlessness and the fever. They are only the outward manifestations of some serious mischief working within them. Send for the medical man who has last attended him. Knowledge of the patient's constitution is very important knowledge in this case."

As Julius returned from letting the doctor out, Anne met him in the hall. She was at once struck by the grave look in his face, and by the fatigue which expressed itself in all his movements.

"You want rest," she said. "Pray go to your room. I have heard what the doctor said to you. Leave it to the landlady and to me to sit up."

Julius owned that he had been traveling from Scotland almost without resting. He was quite unwilling to abandon the responsibility of watching his brother. "You are not to suppose," he said, "that he should see her again, in his present state. I intend to sit in my room, and rest on the bed. If you hear any thing you have only to come and call me."

An hour more passed.

Anne went to Geoffrey's door and listened. He was stirring in the bed, and muttering to himself. She went on to the door of the next room, which Julius had left partly open. Fatigue had overpowered him: she heard, within, the quiet breathing of a man in a sound sleep. Anne turned back again resolved not to disturb him.

At the head of the stairs she hesitated—not knowing what to do. Her horror of entering Hester Detbridge's room, never extinguished. But who else was to do it? The girl had gone to bed. The reason which Julius had given for not employing the assistance of Hester Detbridge was unanswerable. She listened again at Geoffrey's door. No sound was now audible in the room to a person in the passage outside. Would it be well to look in, and make sure that he had only fallen asleep again? She hesitated once more—he was still hesitating, when Hester Detbridge appeared from the kitchen.

She joined Anne at the top of the stairs—looked at her—and wrote a line on her slate: "Frightened to go in? Leave it to Me."

The silence in the room justified the reference that he was asleep. Hester looked in, Hester could do no harm now. Anne accepted the proposal.

"If you find any thing wrong," she said, "don't disturb his brother. Come to me first."

With that caution she withdrew. It was then nearly two in the morning. She, like Julius, was sinking with fatigue. After waiting a little, and hearing nothing, she threw herself on the sofa in her room. If any thing happened, a single step would cause her to hear it.

In the mean while Hester Detbridge opened Geoffrey's bedroom door and went in.

The movements and the mutterings which Anne had heard, had been movements and mutterings in his sleep. The doctor's composing draught, partially applied in its operation for the moment only, had recovered its sedative influence on his brain. Geoffrey was in a deep and quiet sleep.

Hester stood near the door, looking at him. She moved to go out again—stopped—and fixed her eyes on him once more, on one of the inner corners of the room.

The same sinister change which had passed over her once already in Geoffrey's presence, when they met in the kitchen-garden at Windygates, now passed over her again. Her closed lips dropped apart. Her eyes slowly dilated—and fixed their gaze, from the corner, following something along the empty wall, in the direction of the bed—stopped at the head of the bed, where Geoffrey's sleeping face—fair-haired, rigid and glittering, as if they saw a sight of horror in the room. He slept on—and on—in sleep. The sound, slight as it was, broke the spell that held her. She slowly lifted her withered hand, and looked at it, as if it had been in a foul black across the passage; and, rushing into her own room, sank on her knees at the bedside.

Now, in the dead of night, a strange thing happened. Now, in the silence and the darkness, a hideous secret was revealed.

In the sanctuary of her own room—with all the other inmates of the house sleeping round her—the long-suppressed horror of the mysterious and terrible disguise under which she deliberately lived, burst its way through all restraints in the hours of the day. Hester Detbridge spoke. In low, thick, smothered accents—in a wild litany of her own—she prayed. She called upon the mercy of God for deliverance from herself; for strength to endure the possession of the Devil; for blindness to fall on her, for death to strike her, so that she might never see that unnamed thing again. She shook the whole frame of the strong woman when nothing human moved at other times. She writhed on the floor—like a wicked cheeks. One by one, the frantic words of her prayer died away on her lips. Fierce shuddering fits seized her from head to foot. She started up from her knees in the darkness. Light! light! light! The unnamed Horror was looking at her through his open door. She turned the handle—and lit the candle on the table—lit the two other candles set for ornament on the mantle-piece—and, holding one of them in her brightly burning little room. "Ah!" she said to herself, wiping the cold sweat of her agony from her face. "Ah!" she spoke to other people. God's light to me. Nothing to be seen! Nothing to be seen!" Taking one of the candles in her hand, she crossed the passage, with her head down, turned her back on Geoffrey's open door, closed it quietly and softly, stretching out her hand behind her, and retreated again to her own room. She fastened the door, and locked it. She bolted it—as if from this mantle-piece. After considering for a moment, she hung a handkerchief over the key-hole. Then she put a shawl longwise at the bottom of the door, so as to hide the light in her room from the observation of any one in the house who might wake and come that way. This done, she opened the upper part of her dress, and, slipping her fingers into a secret pocket hidden in the inner side of her stays, produced from it some neatly folded pieces of thin paper. Spread out on the table, the leaves revealed themselves—all but the last—as closely covered with writing from head to foot.

The first leaf was headed by this inscription: "My Confession. To be put into my coffin, and laid on my breast when I die."

She turned the manuscript over, so as to get at the last page. The greater part of it was left blank. A few lines of writing, at the top, bore the date of the day of the week and month on which Lady Lundie had dismissed her from the situation at Windygates. The entry was expressed in these terms:

"I have seen IT again to-day. The first time for two months past. In the kitchen-garden. Standing behind the young gentleman whose name is Delamayn. Resist the Devil, and he will flee from you. I have resisted. By prayer. My meditation in solitude. By reading good books. I have left my place. I have lost sight of the young gentleman for good. Who will it stand behind? and point to next? Lord have mercy upon me! Christ have mercy upon me!"

Under this she now added the following lines, then cancelled them, and began the date.

"I have seen IT again to-night. I notice one awful change. It has appeared once behind the same person. This has never happened before. This makes the temptation more terrible than ever. To-night, in his bedroom, between the bed-head and the wall, I have seen IT behind young Mr. Delamayn again. The head just above his face, and the finger pointing downward at his throat. Twice before I have seen man. And never twice behind any other living creature till now. If I see IT a third time behind him—Lord deliver me! Christ deliver me! I daren't think of it. He shall leave my cottage to-morrow. I would fain have prevented this from the bargain, when the stranger took the lodgings for his friend, and the friend proved to be Mr. Delamayn. I say I like it, even now. After the warning to-night, my mind is made up. He shall go. He may like it or not, as he likes, he shall go. (Memorandum: Felt the temptation whispering this time, and the terror passing at the end of the while, as I have never felt them yet. Resisted, as before, by prayer. Am now going down stairs to meditate against it in the hope to fortify myself against it by good books. Lord be merciful to me a sinner!)"

In those words she closed the entry, and put the manuscript back in the secret pocket in her stays.

She went down to the little room looking on the garden, which had once been her brother's study. Anne was lie a lamp, and took some books from a shelf that hung against the wall. The books were the Bible, a volume of Methodist sermons, and a set of collected Memoirs of Methodist saints. Ranging these last carefully on the table, in an order of her own, Hester Detbridge sat down with the Bible on her lap to watch out the night.

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-THIRD.

WHAT had happened in the hours of darkness?

This was Anne's first thought, when the sunlight poured in at her window, and woke her the next morning.

Her sudden immediate inquiry of the servant. The girl could only speak for herself. Nothing had occurred to disturb her after she had gone to bed. Her master was still, she believed, in his room. Mrs. Detbridge was at her work in the kitchen.

Anne went to the kitchen. Hester Detbridge was at her usual occupation at that hour—preparing the breakfast. The slight signs of animation which Anne had noticed in her overnight, were absent this morning. The dull look was back again in her stony eyes; the lifeless power possessed all her movements. Asked if any thing had happened in the night, she slowly shook her stolid head, slowly made the sign with her hand which signified, "Nothing."

Leaving the kitchen, Anne saw Julius in the kitchen-garden. He came to meet her directly.

"I believe I have to thank your consideration for me for some hours of rest," he said. "It is time to be thinking where I am going. I hope you had no reason to regret having left me to sleep? I am glad Geoffrey's sleep has found him stirring. A second dose of the mixture composed him again. The fever has gone. He is not fit to travel, poor, but in the progress like himself. We will return directly to the question of his future. I owe my brother by say you first, about a change which may be coming in your life here."

"Has he consented to the separation?"

"No. He is as obstinate about it as ever. I have placed the matter before him in every light I could think. He still refuses, positively refuses, a provision which would make him an independent man for life."

"Is it the provision he might have had, Lord Holchester, if—"

"Yes, I understand Mrs. Glenarm? No. It is impossible, consistently with my duty to my brother, to do what I owe to my profession in which my father's death has placed me, that I can offer him such a fortune as Mrs. Glenarm's. Still, it is a handsome income for him, large enough to refuse. I shall persist in pressing it on him. He must and shall take it."

Anne felt no reviving hope roused in her by his last words. She turned to another subject.

"You had something to tell me, she said.

"You spoke of a change."

"True. My brother here is a very strange person; and she has done a very strange thing. She has given Geoffrey notice to quit these lodgings."

"Notice to quit?" Anne repeated, in amazement.

"Yes. In a formal letter. She handed it to me open, as soon as I was up this morning. It is not impossible that we get any explanation from her. The poor dumb creature simply wrote on her slate: 'He may have his breakfast in the bed-room.' I said: 'Gently to my surprise (for the woman suspires him with the strongest aversion) Geoffrey refuses to go until he has had it. I have made the peace between them for to-day. Mrs. Detbridge, very reluctantly, consents to give him another seventy hours. And there the matter rests at present."

"What other motive be?" said Anne.

"It's useless to inquire. Her mind is evidently off its balance. One thing is certain—she can not keep you here much longer. The coming change will remove you from this dismal place—which is one blessing, at least. It is quite possible that new scenes and new surroundings may have their influence on Geoffrey for good. His conduct—otherwise quite incomprehensible—may be the result of some latent nervous irritation which medical help might reach. I don't attempt to dissuade from myself or from you, that your position here is a most deplorable one. But before we despair of the future, let us at least inquire whether there is any explanation of my brother's present behavior to be found in the present state of my brother's health. I have been considering what the doctor said to me last night. The first thing to do is to get the best medical advice on Geoffrey's case which is to be had. What do you think?"

"I daren't tell you what I think, Lord Holchester. I will try—it is a very small return to make for your kindness—I will try to use my position with your eyes, not with mine. The best medical advice that you can obtain is the advice of Mr. Speedwell. It was he who first made the discovery that your brother was in broken health."

"The very man for our purpose! I will send him here to-day or to-morrow. Is there any thing else I can do for you? Shall you and Sir Patrick as soon as I get to town. Have you any message for him?"

Anne hesitated. Looking attentively at her, Julius noticed that she changed color when he mentioned Sir Patrick's name.

"Will you say that I gratefully thank him for the letter which Lady Holchester was so good as to give to me, Julius?" she replied. "And will you entreat him, from me, not to expose himself, on my account, to—" she hesitated, and finished the sentence with her eyes on the ground —"to what might happen, if he came here and insisted on seeing me."

"Does he propose to do that?"

She hesitated again. The little nervous contraction of her lips at one side of the mouth became more marked than usual. "He writes that his anxiety is unendurable, and that he is resolved to see me," she answered, softly.

"It is likely to hold to his resolution, I think," said Julius. "When I saw him yesterday, Sir Patrick spoke of you in terms of admiration—"

He stopped. The bright tears were gathering on Anne's eyelashes; one of her hands was toying nervously with something hidden (possibly Sir Patrick's letter) in the bosom of her dress. "I thank him with my whole heart," she said, in low, faltering tones. "But it is best that he should not come here."

"Would you like to write to him?"

"I think I should prefer your giving him my message."

Julius understood that the subject was to proceed no further. Sir Patrick's letter had produced some impression on her, which the sensitive nature of the woman seemed to shrink from acknowledging, even to herself. They turned back to enter the cottage. As they rose, they were met by a surprise. Hester Dethridge, with her bonnet on—dressed, at that hour of the morning, for the street!

"Are you going to market already?" Anne asked.

Hester shook her head.

"When are you coming back?"

Hester wrote on her slate: "Not till the night-time."

Without another word of explanation she pulled her veil down over her face, and made for the gate. She key had been left in the dining-room by Julius, after he had shut the door out. Hester had it in her hand. She opened the gate, and closed the door after her, leaving the key in the lock. At the moment when she door banged to Geoffrey appeared in the passage.

"Where's the key?" he asked. "Who's gone out?"

His brother answered the question. He looked backward and forward suspiciously between Julius and Anne. "What does she want to do at this time?" he said. "His she left the house to avoid Me?"

Julius thought this the likely explanation. Geoffrey went down sullenly to the gate to lock it, and returned to them, with the key in his pocket.

"I'm obliged to be careful of the gate," he said, "with the neighborhood swarming with beggars and tramps. If you want to go out," he added, turning pointedly to Anne, "I'm at your service, as a good husband ought to be."

After a hurried breathlast Julius took his departure. "I don't accept your refusal," he said to his brother, before Anne. "You will see me here again." Geoffrey obstinately repeated the refusal. "If you come here every day of your life," he said, "it will be just the same."

The kind friend Julius, Anne returned again to the solitude of her own chamber. Geoffrey entered the drawing-room, placed the volumes of the Encyclopædia Celestial on the table before him, and resumed the reading which he had been unable to continue on the evening before.

Hour after hour he doggedly plodded through one case of matter after another. He had read one good half of the horrid chronicle of crime before his power of fixing his attention began to fail him. Then he lit his pipe, and went out to think over it in the garden. However the hours passed, he was at the door when she agreed. Sooner or later, there was the dead body always certain to be found; always appearing in dumb witness, in the traces of poison or in the marks of violence, to the crime committed on it.

He walked to and fro slowly, still occupying over the problem which had first found its way into his mind when he had stopped in the front garden, and had looked up at Anne's window in the dark. "How?" That had been the one question before him, from the time when the lawyer had emboldened his hopes of a divorce. It remained the one question still. There was no answer to it in his own brain; there was no answer to it in the book which he had been consulting. Every thing was in his favor if he could only find out "how." He had got his hand with up stairs at his mercy—except to his refusal of the money which Julius had offered to him. He was living in a place absolutely secluded from public observation on all sides of it—thanks to his resolution to remain at the cottage, even after his landlady had insulted him by sending him a notice to quit. Every thing had been prepared, every thing had been sacrificed, to the fulfillment of one purpose—and how to attain that purpose was still the same impenetrable mystery to him which it had been months before!

What was the other alternative? To accept the money which Julius had offered. In other words, to give up his vengeance on Anne, and to turn his back on the splendid future which Mr. Clements's discovery had placed in view.

Never! He would go back to the books. He would set to work again in the drawing-room, and in the pages which were still to be read might set his sluggish brain working in the right direction. He went to the door, and looked round for the suspicion of any living creature, in the house or out of it, was a way that might be found you.

Could a man, in his position of life, sense in this fatal moment, refuse to take the risk merely less wrong? Surely the thought of what he was about to do must have troubled him in the past?

Pause for a moment—and look back at him in the past.

Let us feel any remorse when he was plotting the betrayal of Arnold in the garden at Windygates? For the action which followed it had not been put into him. What he is now in the legitimate consequence of what he was then. A far more serious temptation than the temptation to commit a far more serious crime. How is he to act? Is he to keep his growing cat Sir Patrick once put it), his swiftness in running, his admirable capacity and endurance in every thing that makes a man? Or is he to sacrifice all these advantages over his own selfishness and his own cruelty? No! The moral and mental neglect of himself, in which the smallest spark of pride or feeling about him has tacitly encouraged, has left him at the mercy of the worst impulse in his nature. Above all that is most vile and of all that is most dangerous in the composition of the natural man. Men of the baser kind, who have got into the common has come of this, because no temptation of the higher kind has passed their way. But with him, the case is reversed. A temptation out of the common has passed his way. He has to find his place in society as he can. It finds him, literally and exactly, what has training has left him, from the point of any temptation small or great—a defenseless man.

Geoffrey returned to the cottage. The servant stopped him in the passage, to ask at what time he wished to dine. He answered carelessly, as he inquired angrily for Mrs. Dethridge. Mrs. Dethridge had not come back.

It was now late in the afternoon, and she had been out since the early morning. This had never happened before. Julius had returned to her, one more monstrous than another, begun to rise in Geoffrey's mind. Between the drink and the fear, the old woman had lost her head, was wandering in his mind during a part of the night. Could she be at any thing out in that condition? Had Hester heard it? And was she, by any chance, at the bottom of her long absence from the house? He left the servant standing there, not letting her see that he suspected her—to clear up that doubt as soon as his landlady returned to the house.

The evening came. It was past nine o'clock before Geoffrey could bring his mind to what came to ask for the key. Geoffrey rose to go to the gate himself—and changed his mind before he left the room. Her suspicions might be aroused (supposing it to be Hester who was waiting for admittance) if he opened the gate to her when the servant was there to do it. He gave the girl the key, and kept out of sight.

* * * * * * *

"Dead tired!"—the servant said to herself, seeing her mistress by the light of the lamp over the gate.

"Dead tired!"—Geoffrey said to himself, observing Hester's movements with his eyes only as the passage on her way up stairs to take off her bonnet in her own room.

"Dead tired!" Anne said to herself, meeting Hester on the upper floor, and receiving from her the letter which Julius had left, addressed to the mistress of the cottage by the postman, who had met her at her own gate.

* * * * * * *

Having given the letter to Anne, Hester Dethridge withdrew to her bedroom.

Geoffrey closed the door of the drawing-room, in which the candles were burning, and went into the dining-room, which was dimly lit by light. Leaving the door ajar, he waited to intercept his landlady on her way back to her quarters in the kitchen.

Hester wearily secured her door, wearily lit the candles, and opened her desk and ink on the table. For some minutes after this she was occupied in writing down, and ruling her accession," out of the secret pocket of her stays—turned to the last page of the manuscript—and began. Slowly, under the entry made on the previous night.

"This morning I gave him notice to quit, and offered him his money back if he wanted it. He refuses to go. He shall go to-morrow, or I will burn the place over his head. All through to-day I have avoided him by keeping out of the house. No rest to ease my mind, and no sleep to close my eyes. I humbly bear my cross as long as my strength will last me."

Her pen dropped from her fingers. Her head nodded on her breast. She roused herself with a start. "No sleep!" she said, drowsily: sleep brought dreams.

She unfastened the window-shutters and looked out at the night. The peaceful moonlight was shining over the garden. The clear depths of the night sky were soothing and beautiful to look at. What! Fading already? clouds? darkness? No! Nearly asleep once more. She roused herself again, with a start. There was the moonlight, and there was the garden as bright and clear as ever.

Dreams or no dreams, it was useless to fight longer against the drowsiness that overpowered her. She closed the shutters, and went back to the bed; and put her Confession in its customary place at the head of the pillow.

She looked round the room—and shuddered. Every corner of it was filled with the terrible memories of the past night. She might wake from the tortures of the dreams to find the terror of the discovery reaching at her bedside. Was there no remedy? no blessed safeguard under which she could resign herself to sleep? She thought crossed her mind. The good book—the Bible. If she slept with the Bible under her pillow, there was hope in the good book—the hope of sleeping in peace.

It was true—she had put on the gown and she stays which she had taken off. Her shawl would cover her. It was equally needless to take off her shoes. The lower shutters would not be closed at that hour; and if they were, she could find her hand on the Bible, in its place on the parlor book-shelf, in the dark.

She removed the Confession from under the pillow. On the way to a minute could she prevail on herself to leave it in our room while she was away from it in another. With the manuscript folded up, and concealed in her hand, she slowly descended the stairs again. Her knees trembled under her. She was obliged to hold by the banisters with the hand that was free.

Geoffrey observed her from the dining-room, on her way across the stairs. He waited to see what she did, before he showed himself, and spoke to her. She went out of going out into the kitchen, she stopped short, and entered the parlor. Another suspicious circumstance! What did she want in the parlor, without a candle, at that time of night?

He left the book-case—her dark figure plainly visible in the moonlight that flooded the little room. She staggered and put her hand to her head, giddy, in all appearance, from sudden fatigue. She recovered herself, and took a book from the shelf. She approached him—but shall after she had possessed herself of the book. Too weary, as it seemed, to get up stairs again without a light. He scrambled on his knees—but he was not. Better rest, for a moment or two, to be had in that room could be got by leaning against the wall. She sat down heavily in the chair, with the book on her lap. One of her arms hung over the side of the chair, with the hand closed, apparently holding something.

Her head sunk on her breast—recovered itself—and sunk gently on the cushion at the back of the chair. Asleep? Fast asleep.

Geoffrey took off his heavy shoes, and entered the drawing-room with his stockings. He picked up the white thing on the floor. It proved to be a collection of several sheets of thin paper, neatly folded together, and closely covered with writing.

Writing? As long as she was awake she had kept it hidden in her hand. Why hide it?

Had he let out any thing to compromise himself with Anne, in the conversation with the dear the night before? and had she taken it down in writing to produce against him? Possessed by guilty distrust, even that monstrous doubt assumed a look of probability to Geoffrey's mind. He left the paper in the place where he had entered it, and made for the candle-light in the drawing-room, determined to examine the manuscript in his hand.

After carefully smoothing out the folded leaves on the table, he turned to the first page, and read these lines.

"PRIVATE."

All secrecy is injurious in its nature. We do not mean to say that man can conduct the private business of his life without secrecy in his affairs which require privacy. Where is the man who can boast that he has kept free from the prudence of a skeleton in his cupboard? But the fewer that we have of these promising inmates the better for our own easiness and all those who are concerned with us. A secret, if we think of it, has a sort of quality of the skeleton. It is to us a secret because the divulging of it would be injurious to us. It is kept hallowed, not because it is bad, but because it might become a pain. No doubt there is an excitement about a secret—a sense of relief—which, to a certain extent be pleasurable. The knowledge of that which is unknown to others has an allowance of pride in it, and a sense of power. But, as stands apart from the general good or evil of secrecy in the abstract, it is to us, and there is a secret which is rather reticence than secrecy, which is born of modesty, and can hurt no possessor of it. It is the reticence which induces us to be silent on our own affairs, because to tell them aloud to the world around us would be an impertinence. A man does not speak to every one he meets in the street of his balance at the banker's, or of his wife's excellence, or his own hopes and fears in regard to saving grace. He has certain reticences which prompt him to be wholesome, but which are not kept as secrets because to divulge them would be dangerous or unhealthy. I also have a secret, but not reason—and we all have such secrets—is surely a burden and a sorrow and a skeleton in the cupboard which may come forth some day and grin at us before our friends.

The less of secrecy we have in our lives the better. He who has none, though he may suffer sorrow, is free from that fear of his fellow-men which is the worst of suffering. But the friend, or acquaintance, or stranger, who sends us a letter and writes "private" on the top of it, at once places upon us an added burden, a new secret, another weight, from the bearing of which, in nine cases out of ten, no advantage can accrue to ourselves. There are those attached to most of us, for whom to bear such burdens is the privilege of our existence, and he who has no compact, written or unwritten, with any friend, rendering himself liable to such obligation, is indeed to be pitied. To be subject to no call for private aid can only be the lot of him who can make up his mind to endure on his own behalf. Such a one must be fatherless, childless, wifeless, brotherless, and friendless. But before we allow the claim it will at least be well to consider the position of the claimant, and to ask ourselves whether he has a right to demand from us that we should bear this load which he seeks to impose upon us. If he have no such right, or no claim based upon previous mutual engagements, we hold that he can not establish it by writing "private" either on the inside or the outside of a letter.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE RULING PASSION.—A famous saucer of Paris being on the deathbed, a certain friend presented a silver crucifix to him, with a view to awaken within him the last sentiments of piety. On tying the ribbon, after kissing the cross with the most minute attention, suddenly exclaimed, "Ah, Lord! you have put a very small ruin on such a pledge."

Eighty-one dozen of eggs given to a minister in Illinois as a "donation visit" is called "a big activity."

Jail yards are called hanging gardens.

A new name for the Gorman is "Hugging set to Music."

HUMAN pledges can go no further. The negro voters of Louisville carry a ballot-box on their backs. We will insist hereafter on a vote with the Democratic ticket.

THE PARLIAMENT.—A country poet, after looking about with a "domain view" is called "a rural."

"Oh, I wouldn't live forever,
I wouldn't if I could;
But I would like to live as long as it,
For I couldn't if i. would."

HARD TO BEAT.—Carpets.

There is no stated rule for writing love-letters. You should write as the feeling prompts, and let your heart do as you can, using words of such burning love that they will melt the icy pulse of the pen. You also advise to sling in a bunch of pathos occasionally, such as "Dearest, darling, precious, I long for you hourly, as an elephant; I think of you every day, and by-and-by I shall be with you once more; I shall think of you twice a day." It is also well to put on ink-blot in the letter, with the exclamation, "Darling, I kissed this spot," or, "I bore a sigh in this vicinity."

It has been scientifically discovered that we have an inch more room in a thick boot than in a thin one. It is made better and cheaper by a new process. Dots must go into some other business.

AT SAN FRANCISCO, when the Chinamen were leaving the city recently, and there was high elevation on the sidewalk, a Celestial would step down, look at it, and then step up again, which was carried on day after day with the talls on it. "Sure they're China antlers from the Flowery Kingdom," replied Pat, "or I'd like to be the gardener that would set them out under the trees. I keep them planted deep till next spring, an' then for their ordinary I'll write somethin' on 'Talks from Darkness,' an' I'm off."

A Rondout grocer notifies the public that he has "Know Styler for Sail."

A NEW DISCOVERY.—A father was questioning his children one day, when he found that they had been written in Genesis descriptive of the construction of the ark. "Then how high," asked he, "was the ark?" I guess they next it enough," shouted an impertinent opposition.

"Oh, Brandt! Brandt!" he cried in pain.

BAWL DOESBURG—Baby clothes.

A coppersmith, who figured largely in ward-room politics, at a meeting the other night, finding the fun turning against him, exclaimed with a magnanimous air, "I'll not be put down by the tyrants." I guess they next it enough," shouted an impertinent opposition.

An old hotel-keeper, in Washington, once posted on his dining-room door the following notice: "Mem-bers of Congress must not take the table cloth to the gentlemen. Boarders and blackguards must not mix their drinks in the tumblers, as it is liable to injure the other."

A new Hampshire farmer wanted a farm hand, and was applied to by an Irishman who wanted to work. "Can you be depended to ringing the bell at meal time?" two Irishmen previously in the employ had died on the premises. "Sure, I can," was the reply. "I'll try ye," said Pat. "Faith and I'll bring you ricomindations from every place where I've worked that I never played such a trick."

"Barber," said a farmer to his tonsor, "now can't you keep you eagle to shave for half price." "Can't, Mr. B——," said the man of razors. "I ought really to charge more, for I have to drive down every week each long factor that I have from the ground to go over."

The North Scituate (Massachusetts) stage overturned lately, having three passengers inside, none of whom were injured. The driver fell inside, but was not one to know often, and who seemed to think that it was all in the day's work. Looking out of the window, after the coach had upset, and called to the driver, saying that "stick" was broken, "Never mind, my boy, up the hill, if the pesky thing was going to ride so unsteady."

THE "CITY OF RAGUSA."

"PORT of Liverpool, granted number 2020. Bonded and drawback stores in the City of Ragusa, J. C. BICKLEY, master, for New York: two men. No passengers or troops. No guns. Two tons." So runs the victualing bill of this tiny vessel, which left the Mersey on the morning of the 3d of June for a run across the Atlantic to New York, and, should that first experiment be a success, a run back again to Liverpool. This vessel formerly belonged to the ship Breeze, which foundered in a terrific storm in the Channel, fourteen of the crew succeeding in reaching Ramsey, Isle of Man, in the boat which has thus shown her sea-going qualities. She has since been decked over, with a small cockpit aft; her cabin has been made as comfortable as the limited space will permit, and she carries three months' provisions and one hundred gallons of water, which can be pumped out of the tanks should it be desirable to lighten the vessel. She has been rigged as a yawl, and can also set square-sails on both masts, spreading about seventy yards of canvas. In addition to her sailing power, she is fitted with a two-bladed screw propeller, which can be raised when not in use, and is worked by hand in the same manner as a ship's pump. The crew consists of two men and a Newfoundland dog, all told. The City of Ragusa is the smallest vessel ever cleared at the Liverpool Custom-house, and the gentleman who performed that duty for her also cleared the Great Eastern. After being out a few days she put into the harbor of Cork, Ireland, to repair, having sprung a leak. At last accounts she was again ready for sea, and only waiting for a favorable wind to start. Her captain expects to make the voyage in about fifty days.

GOING TO MASS.

THIS characteristic illustration represents the people of an Irish hamlet, in their Sunday attire, on their way to attend mass. There is a marked difference between their present and their everyday appearance. There is no tattered and loop-holed ragged ness now, but in decent attire, they are going to those devotions in the observance of which, to their credit be it said, the Irish peasantry are so regular. The parish would appear to be a populous one, to judge from the congregation that is gathered about the chapel. There are burly well-to-do farmers, country women, shop-keepers, the gentry who have come on their outside car, and the typical peasantry of the country with their long-tailed coats and high-crowned hats, who reverence the priest, till the land, and exercise their time-honored privilege of grumbling. That is a privilege which every body claims, and if Pat has been louder and more persistent in his wailings than others, it must be confessed that he has had hard matter-of-fact wrongs to suffer, as well as many sentimental grievances which others are apt to laugh at, but which are, perhaps, still harder to bear than the practical burdens of real life.

THE ENGLISH GUARDSMAN.

THE histrionic proclivities of the guardsman render him, as a rule, remarkably serviceable in the management of amateur theatricals. On such occasions it is clearly his mission to be utilized to the utmost extent. It is a real charity to teach him to occupy his time. And, on the whole, he does not dislike the sense of the importance which attaches to him as a man idle, indeed, by nature, but capable of great things by art. Once fairly rouse him into energy, and he is indefatigable. He will hunt up acting editions with exemplary patience, will go into the mysteries of theatrical costume; nay, if he has any dexterity with his pencil—an accomplishment not so uncommon with the class as might be expected—he will very likely condescend to devise a dress himself. There is something quite touching in the spectacle of the careful study which the bearded warrior will give to the part that he is called upon to get up. He carries it about with him in his pocket; you may see him taking fitful glances at it in the smoking-room of his club; it lies on his toilet-table while he is occupied with his back hair; he will ask you, in beseeching tones, to dodge him in it, for the purpose of testing his perfection. For two or three whole weeks before the eventful night you may know, from his preoccupied look, that there is seated upon his manly bosom the burden of a great care. In his solitary moments he rehearses before the looking-glass; when he is in company he is given to fits of moody reverie, during which you may observe his lips mechanically moving, as if in silent soliloquy with himself. The poor fellow is, in truth, repeating to himself the lines which he has to commit to memory and to deliver to an enraptured audience in a West End or country house drawing-room. Society is under a great debt to its self-sacrificing hero.

But the demands of society upon its guardsmen do not end here. It is well worth while to notice the effect of the entrance of one of these tawny mustached, immaculately arrayed warriors into a drawing-room of fair occupants.

"By Jove! enough to make a fellow nervous, you know; ain't much up to that kind of thing, you know," the poor fellow will tell you; "but hang it, positively feel inclined to blush. By Jove! those girls, they literally mob one when one comes into the room; expect you to know every thing, you know—who's dead, buried, or married; who's eloped with who." Strict grammatical accuracy is not always our guardsman's strong point; perhaps we should rather say it is the exception. "What's the betting on Mrs. Flinder's bolting with Skyaway before the season's out, and all that sort of thing, you know. Gad! a fellow feels quite overcome, you know."

GOING TO MASS.

And as Captain Fitzinnin finishes this unusually eloquent address, he sinks down into his easy-chair exhausted, overcome with a sense of the commensurate magnitude of the claims of society upon him, and his own policy of enterprising self-sacrifice. As the man of war refreshes himself with nicotine, the true nature of his position begins to dawn upon him. He begins vaguely to comprehend that a man who honor," continues our friend, "to hear the way in which they suggest dinners at Richmond, picnics, and the deuce knows what else, would fancy that a fellow only lived to please 'em. By Jove! I swear I've engagements half a dozen deep for the next three weeks. Can't dine quietly without having to rush off to some infernal place. Gad! it's killing me. I think I shall make a premature bolt for the moors."

The benches on which the children are placed are erected in the form of a Roman amphitheatre, rising in graduated tiers to a considerable height. The spectators are seated in the centre of this amphitheatre, and on graduated benches in the aisles. The children of each school sit together—the boys being placed above the girls—and the effect of the differently colored costumes, which are the distinguishing marks of voices of happy children not harmonious?—can hardly fail to move the heart and excite the charity of the most churlish spectator.

plumes himself on nothing to do, may gradually discover that there is nothing which he is expected to leave undone. Nonnunn avaris negotiosa quam otiosa—we beg the captain's pardon for troubling him with "that confounded Latin," which he probably left behind him when he quitted Eton; but we can not repress a quotation which is so singularly apt.

"People work me like a galley-slave. Think we can be always at their beck and call: on my

LONDON CHARITY CHILDREN.

We give on this page an illustration of the London Charity School Festival, which took place on the 8th of June, in St. Paul's Cathedral. This festival, which was established in 1704, is carried on by a society of about a thousand persons, and the sum realized by the festival is divided between the most needy of those charities which take part in the ceremony.

each institution, is most striking and picturesque. The services consist of singing and other musical entertainments by the children and the cathedral choir, and a prettier and more touching spectacle can hardly be imagined. The sight of several thousand children who have been rescued from a miserable, and possibly vicious mode of living, and who are now clothed, educated, and frequently started in life, and the sound of so many harmonious voices—and when are the

this, and enjoins a man to have only one wife, and this most precious object of the domestic circle is, oddly enough, called "Tey." Her children take precedence of any others, of which there are, it must be stated, generally some in every household who can not claim the wife as their mother. These children are those of the handmaids, as they may be called; and these handmaids correspond pretty much to the old Oriental term of concubine, only that they are in a great measure servants to the wife, and expected to make themselves generally useful, and on no account to pretend to be equal to the real mistress of the establishment. A gentleman does not hesitate, nor is it any discredit among them, to indulge his fancy for any number of these handmaids that his purse will enable him to keep. They are generally of inferior birth, and bought of their parents, becoming the estate and sole property of the buyer, who, precisely like the slave-owners, is at liberty to sell them or give them away as presents at any time. A man does not, however, take unto himself a handmaid if his wife has borne him a son, as the great desire of every Chinese is to perpetuate his name and family, so as to insure the ancestral rites being paid him at his funeral. If he has no son either by wife or handmaid, he often adopts one of his relatives, and even goes so far as to purchase a boy—plenty of whom are ready to be sported with, unfortunately, in China—and makes him up as his own, carefully concealing the parentage of the child. It speaks well, however, for the liking of the Chinese male sex, that the universal desire is to marry as soon as a man can support a wife and family. They marry very early—the men from sixteen to twenty, the women from twelve to fifteen. The marriage laws are very strict. No man and woman of the same surname may marry, neither can any couple within certain degrees of consanguinity. If a woman has been formally betrothed, she can not marry any other person. No government official can marry in the district, town, or city in which he holds office, nor may he marry an actress or woman of low degree or occupation. A few days before the wedding, which is generally fixed in the month of February, the bride-elect has her hair dressed in the fashion of a married lady, flowers and ornaments. Presents are made by friends to both bride and bridegroom, and in the evening of the day the bridegroom goes in a gaudily decked sedan to the house of his bride's parents, accompanied by troops of friends and a band of music. The lady is placed in the sedan, and carried off by the friends of the bridegroom to his house, where a grand feast is prepared. The happy pair drink some wine out of the same cup of chance," as it is called, and then the husband leads her to her chamber and unveils her face, to admire her and give the key of it to have, hanging by her back to the company to receive a kind of benediction from the oldest matron lady relative of the party, and then the consequet proceeds. The next day offerings are made to the gods, and the honey-moon is passed in merry-making.

WHY BE DISFIGURED

With ulcers, erysipelas, acne, pimples, or boils, when the vitiated blood that produces them can be cleansed and vitalized by taking Swaim's Panacea and Alterative Powders. The entire treatment of this invaluable combination increases the vital force of the system, and the sulphur resolves the venom in the circulation into a fluid which is expelled in the form of insensible perspiration. In all cases of cutaneous and ulcerous diseases the pores are in a torpid condition. The iron stimulates these vessels, and this invisibly discharges the contaminating humors which the action of the sulphur has expelled from the blood. This is the philosophy of the cures daily effected by these powders.

Infection in the Air.

Experimental chemists have repeatedly analyzed the air at unhealthy seasons, in the hope of detecting the invisible agent which produces epidemic disease. They have not yet discovered it, and scarcely any two of them agree as to its nature. This is of little consequence. It is sufficient to know that this poisonous principle exists, and that a safeguard against its insidious influence has been provided. In the spring and early summer, when fever and ague, remittent fever, and other diseases typical of that class are prevalent, it is only necessary to fortify the system with a course of

to escape them. If this precaution has been neglected, which it ever ought to be in any district liable to such visitations, and if the paroxysm of malarious fever have actually commenced, they may always be checked and broken up by a course of that powerful vegetable tonic and alterative. Persons who once considered the only specific for chills and fever; but it is now generally admitted that this nauseous drug is a dangerous medicine, and that its secondary effects are more to be dreaded than any form of intermittent fever. It is simply a tremendous astringent. It does not touch the disordered liver, or regulate the bowels, or in any way improve the condition of the animal fluids. Hostetter's Bitters, on the other hand, in addition to the liver and outer tonic action upon the preparation of quinine, has a balsamic effect upon the whole system. It is a genial and salt-fetching as well as directly invigorating, and purifies the secretions so as to restore to health the secretive organs. It stimulates the appetite, strengthens the stomach, soothes the nerves, promotes healthful perspiration, and induces quiet sleep. As a stomachic it has no rival. Cases of indigestion that no other tonic seems capable of alleviating are cured in a few weeks by its regular use.

A DELIGHTFUL SUMMER BOOK.

THE BUTTERFLY HUNTERS

By Mrs. HIRAM S. COVANT. 1 vol. 16mo. Beautifully Illustrated. $1 50.

"Mrs. Covant's agreeable little book introduces a bevy of 'butterfly hunters' with whom her young readers take a long and delightful summer ramble, wherein boating and botany, walks and talks, incident and borough adventure mingle with butterfly lore. In this way the contents of the book become lots into an eager sport, and the story, with its dialogue and circumstance, carries along its undertow of instruction, which is thus taken in unconsciously by the young reader."—Boston Transcript.

"Mrs. Helen S. Conant has discovered a right 'royal road' to the study of Natural History, and very pleasantly and practically she points out the best methods to the Butterfly Hunters. On the slightest thread of an interesting narrative of adventures in the New England woods she strings a great number of facts in regard to butterflies' nests, however, unwisely our young lads and lasses may have understood, but teaching very clearly just enough about the insect to incite a child to wish for further information. It is an entertaining as well as instructive book, and the numerous illustrations are from a well-modelled character, and add greatly to the interest and value of the book."—Harper's Weekly.

were paid for taxes to U. S. Government during four years by the House of Lorillard. This amount is not exceeded by any Tobacco House in the world.

Their Century Chewing Tobacco is now made of thicker, sweet, re-dried, and cured leaf of the best stalkable varieties.

LORILLARD'S Yacht-club Smoking Tobacco, in fine cut, Nos. 1 and 2, and Yacht-club Cigarettes, are the favorite tobaccos with the connoisseurs for those, and prepared by an original and unrivaled process, which gives the best flavor and mildness, as well as the nicotine, is extracted, rendering it mild and healthful to the nervous organization. For delightful aroma, leaves no disagreeable taste, and will not burn the tongue if a pipe is used.

The Eureka Smoking is also a favorite brand, being made of choice Virginia, and is considered free and smooth; has an agreeable flavor, but is of heavier body than the Yacht-Club, and changes in price; by mixing these two together an article of any desired strength may be obtained.

As an evidence of the popularity of Lorillard's Smoking Tobacco that the Yacht-Club packages were sold during 1869, and still the demand increases.

Harper's Bazar.

A REPOSITORY OF

FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most rapid and wonderful ever known in the annals of journalism, and is recognized as the best and most attractive family publication issued. As an illustrated chronicler of Fashion it is without a rival in this country. By a special arrangement, involving great expense, with the publishers of the Berlin Bazar—the leading journal of fashion in Europe—its illustrations are published in New York simultaneously with their appearance in the German city.

As a literary journal the BAZAR is every week devoted to instructive and entertaining reading-matter—Stories, Poems, Biographical Sketches, Essays, Gossip. Editorial articles are always spicy, and cover every topic of social interest. No effort and no expense will be spared to permanently secure for this journal the victory which it has won so rapidly, and which is so well deserved.

The paper features of the beautiful Paris Costumes in HARPER'S BAZAR, outside the regular Supplement, printed in black figure from 40 to 48 inches in measure, with the names and directions for putting together, and the Illustration of the Costume to be made, are sent to the Publishers a week in advance by mail of Twenty-five Cents and bust measure. The same Patterns can be had of Agents in all the cities. Agents are supplied with the entire set of nine sizes at $2 50. Correspondents should at the outset address, in ordering, please specify the number of Bazar containing suit and bust measure.

In the BAZAR for April 16 was commenced "The Unbeloved," a social story of thrilling interest, by The Author of "Cord and Creese," "The Dodge Club," etc. Price, 10 cents per copy.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and commentary upon, all the important events of the time. Due attention is also given to topics of special interest to the family circle, and nothing necessary is constantly engaged in the department of illustration, and the Publishers are also largely indebted to photographers in all the large cities of America, Europe, and the East, for valuable aid in this department.

As a literary journal, HARPER'S WEEKLY is unsurpassed as the only illustrated newspaper which has ever succeeded in establishing and maintaining a claim to pre-eminence.

The Political Course of HARPER'S WEEKLY constitutes one of its most prominent features; it includes weekly articles upon National Finance, Trade, Commerce, and Miscellaneous topics.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—N. Y. Observer.

The Best Monthly Periodical, not in this country alone, but in the English language.—The Press, Phila.

Harper's Magazine.

The June Number began the Forty-first Vol. of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, with success unprecedented—unrivaled by that of any other monthly periodical in Europe or America—and has become the popular channel and natural vehicle of its contents; to the enterprise of its Publishers in securing for its pages, as they have, the best literary contributions of English and American writers; to the prompt and unsparing use of money in every department; to the promptness, enthusiasm, and popularity of its Editorial Management; to the constant adoption of the most successful improvements of the age, and upon current topics; and to the variety and interest of its Illustrations. Every department of the Magazine, as new one has been added, viz., the Monthly Scientific Record. Such unprecedented success as the present success of the Magazine has depended will still continue to be its leading characteristics; and for the future no expedient that will increased attraction to the wants of the reading public, and to the value of its pages ever its present popularity.

The Volumes of the Magazine contain from fifty to one hundred and per cent more matter than is furnished by any publication issued in the English language. Thus the supplies a large and valuable Library of Literature every year, and to treat fully of all the topics embraced in their plan.

Published Monthly, with profuse Illustrations.

ROBERTSON'S SERMONS,

Complete in One Volume.

SERMONS PREACHED AT BRIGHTON by the late Rev. FREDERICK W. ROBERTSON, the Incumbent of Trinity Chapel. New Edition. With Portrait on Steel. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

Here is a book which has gone through as great a number of editions as the most popular novel. It has all those marks of solemn earnestness which we only to be seen in books which belong to great public libraries. It is Dissent, dog's-eared, pencil-marked, worn by much perusal. Is it then a novel? On the contrary it is a volume of sermons. A free, tender, and lofty mind, full of thoughtfulness, full of devotion, has left its legacy to his humanity. It is not rhetoric or any vulgar excitement of eloquence that draws so many readers to the book, so many hearers to this preacher's feet. It is not with the action of a theatrical performer, with contorted arms and countenance of flame, that he presses his Gospel upon his hearers. It is because in the pulpit, as in those cosy, easy chairs of literature, this greatest essentialist, like his Master, with the multitude palpitating round, had no affectation or pose in his own thoughtful, contemplative breast. The Sermons of Robertson have few of the characteristics of sermons. Save for the charm of a singularly pure and lucid style, their almost sole attribute is their rushing power of instruction, in their faculty of opening up the mysteries of life and truth. It is pure teaching, so far as that ever can be administered to a popular audience, which is offered to us in these volumes.—London Review's Magazine.

These Sermons are full of thought and beauty, and delightful illustrations of the ease with which a gifted and disciplined mind can make the obscure transparent, the difficult plain. There is not a sermon, we does not furnish evidence of originality without extravagance, of liberalism-ism without infidelism-ism, and of piety without cant or conventionalism.—British Quarterly.

Every word he wrote is eagerly sought for and affectionately treasured up, and meets with the most fervent and affirming welcome from men of all parties and all shades of opinion.  To those that find in his writings what they themselves want, he is a treasure indeed. They have found in him a man with a message to bring, a truth and love to tell, which they can not find elsewhere. And they never look to him in vain.  He drew himself upon the recollection on a most original and profound thinker, and on a man in whom excellence puts on a new form.  There are many persons, and the number increases every year, to whom Robertson's writings are the most attractive, satisfactory, and exhaustless form of religious teaching which the nineteenth century has given—the most wise, suggestive, and practical.—Saturday Review.

The sermons are altogether out of the common run. They are earnest, free, and beautiful utterances of a gifted and cultivated mind.—Eclectic Review.

Carbolic Salve.

The important discovery of the CARBOLIC ACID as a CLEANSING, PURIFYING, and HEALING Agent is one of the most remarkable results of modern medical research. During the late civil war it was extensively used in the Hospitals, and was found to be not only a thorough disinfectant, but also the most powerful and speedy HEALING REMEDY ever known.

It is now presented in a scientific combination with other soothing and healing agencies, in the form of a SALVE; and, having been already used in numberless cases with most satisfactory and beneficial results, we have no hesitation in offering it to the public as the most certain, rapid, and effectual remedy for all Sores and Ulcers, no matter of how long standing, for Burns, Cuts, Wounds, and every ABRASION of SKIN or FLESH, and for Skin diseases generally.

Sold by all Druggists. Price 25 cents.

PEA-NUTS.

OUR illustration on this page represents a scene which is perfectly familiar to those who have visited our Southern cities: and we dare say some of our readers who have sauntered along the Savannah docks may recognize the features of the good-natured and almost superannuated aunty whose bent figure, sheltered by the tattered umbrella, and surrounded by heaping baskets of roasted pea-nuts, forms the principal object in our picture. It was drawn from life, greatly to the delight of the old woman, who had never before been honored by the attentions of an artist.

The pea-nut, though almost universally liked, is considered very "ungenteel." Its cheapness, and the ease with which the soft shell is broken, make it a favorite with boys; and it is rare indeed to empty a little fellow's pocket and not find among its wonderfully miscellaneous contents two or three pea-nuts or the debris of their crumbling shells. Outside of boy-dom the popularity of the pea-nut is chiefly confined to people who frequent such places of amusement as the Bowery Theatre, the atmosphere of which is always redolent of the pea-nut stand and the beer gardens. Such people, indeed, munch them every where—as they walk the street, on the cars, in the stages, and aboard the ferry-boats, scattering the shells abroad with the utmost indifference, and littering the dress of every person in their neighborhood. Pea-nuts impart a pungent odor to the breath, which makes the eater almost as great a nuisance in a crowd as one who indulges in the luxury of Limburger cheese.

In this city there are hundreds of stands where pea-nuts are sold, and the trade in them must be very large, if not particularly remunerative. There must be several hundred old men and old women in New York alone who make their living at these stands—their entire sales consisting, on any day, of a few shillings worth of pea-nuts, with perhaps a dozen or two apples, whose surface shines with a polish too suggestive of the process by which it is obtained for delicate stomachs. Occasionally you may see a gentleman purchasing at these stands; but generally it is done with a furtive glance to see that nobody is near whose observation might be unpleasant. If one likes pea-nuts, and is thus sensitive, it is convenient to have the protection of a little son or nephew, who may not, however, in all cases reap the benefit of the purchase.

The pea-nut is not recognized in polite society. It is never found at dessert. Yet a few years ago an American in Munich placed on the dinner-table of the Hôtel de Bavière a dish of these with other nuts peculiar to this continent, for the benefit of his German friends, and the unanimous verdict of the foreign members of the party was, that the pea-nut was most excellent eating. Thus pea-nuts, like prophets, are not without honor save in their own country; and it is not likely they will ever rise above their present position here where the whites and the red men seem fated to wage a warfare that can cease only with the extermination of the aboriginal inhabitants.

The scene of our artist's sketch is the interior of a strongly built cabin, just at daybreak. The young mother has snatched the sleeping babe from the rude cradle in the corner, and is trying with the fight. The house will be bravely defended; and let us hope that murderous hand may be driven off, with a lesson that shall make them keep clear of that cabin for many a long day.

Late advices from the frontier, where the settlers are in constant danger of attack, show that the Indians are very much disturbed and discontented, and that very little provocation is required to bring on a general war. SPOTTED TAIL has returned home from his Eastern journey to find his favorite wife dead. In his ignorance he attributes this bereavement to the machinations and misgivings of the whites, and in her grave buries all his presents and all his new-born friendship for his civilized brethren. His present mood is said to be extremely warlike. The situation is certainly precarious, and unless wise measures of precaution are taken at once our far Western frontiers may witness many terrible scenes of bloodshed and devastation.

PEA-NUT SELLERS IN SAVANNAH.—[FROM A SKETCH BY LLOYD MIFFLIN, JUN.]

CORAL REEFS.

MR. DARWIN, some years ago, prepared a map in which were put down all the reefs of coral which surround the numerous islands in the Pacific. In one almost straight line of ten thousand miles, from Pitcairn Island to Chusan, those reefs stud the vast ocean. The reefs are classified, for convenience, into three groups: 1. The atoll reef is a circular or curved ridge of coral, visible at low-water, but nearly covered at high-water, and having a tranquil lake in the centre. The diameter varies from one mile to sixty miles, in different examples; and the shape is usually an irregular oval. There is generally a profound depth of ocean at a very short distance from the atoll. In one case, the depth is a thousand feet at a distance of less than a quarter of a mile; but, far more noteworthy than this, there is one atoll at two hundred feet from which no soundings could be found with twelve hundred feet of line; and another where seven thousand feet found no bottom at a mile and a quarter distance! The interior lake or lagoon is never profoundly deep. We may therefore picture to ourselves an atoll as the top of a steep conical submarine mountain, with a kind of crater at the summit. 2. The barrier reef differs from an atoll in having one or more islands within it; it forms, in fact, a barrier around an island or islands, at some considerable distance, and separated by a moat of very deep water. Some of them run along parallel to the shore: in some the islands have joined to form a continuous strip of dry land; while in others one sees the strip of land forming a very lofty mountain. 3. The shore reef resembles a barrier reef in having land within or near it; but the dry land is very near,

AN INDIAN ATTACK.

THOUGH not designed to illustrate an actual event, our picture on page 457 this week is something more than a mere fancy sketch. Scenes like the one so graphically imagined and portrayed by our artist are unhappily of too frequent occurrence on our far Western frontier, to quiet the cries of the boy who clings about her waist. Two young girls, awaked from sleep by the yells of the savage assailants, crouch together in terror on their bed. One of the brave defenders has already received a wound in the arm, perhaps from the arrow that lies on the floor in front of him, and the self-possessed matron of the cabin is binding it up, so that he can go on and the red men seem fated to and the intervening water very shallow; while in most instances there are no islands or islets, the whole reef being submerged at high-water. In all the three kinds—atoll, barrier, and shore —the reef has been formed by countless myriads of coral insects, working at the construction of their hollow dwellings. Mr. Darwin, by tracing a local connection between volcanoes and reefs, arrived at a conclusion that, wherever an atoll or a barrier reef has been formed, the bed of the ocean has subsided; while at the spots where shore reefs occur, the bed of the sea is either uprising or stationary. Islands and mountains in the Pacific have been submerged by the subsidence of the ocean bed; and when this subsidence had taken place to a certain extent, coral insects set to work at their busy labors; for, whether in the Pacific or the Mediterranean, the insect always works to the water, but at no great depth below the surface. All these facts are satisfactorily accounted for on this view, as being in three stages of development. The shore reefs are formed first, as a fringe of coral around the coast of an island; by further subsidence, each becomes in time a barrier reef; and each of the latter develops into an atoll reef, by the insects constantly building at the top of it.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE GNATS.

THE newspapers that used to call Mr. LINCOLN a third-rate country lawyer, and "think" at the contrast in political ability between him and JEFFERSON DAVIS, are very busy in attempting to cast odium and ridicule upon President GRANT. Their conduct is inspired by the same spirit which led them to denounce him in the field as a butcher. But his real crimes in the eyes of his severest critics are his steady fidelity to the Union, and his unconditional victory over the rebellion. The rebellion sprang from the principles of the Democratic party. It was led by the Democratic chiefs. It was sustained by Democratic sympathy. Every great measure of the war was denounced by the Democratic conventions; and in the midst of the struggle the Democratic party virtually declared for secession to the voluntary. The World now frankly admits that the "War Democracy" was a "small body." And to the regret to a party which counted upon the success of the rebellion a man who silently and powerfully opposed it, and finally, by his skillful military combinations, compelled its military chiefs to surrender, can only be a target of constant calumny. Consequently no public man was ever more ruthlessly slandered by them than President GRANT. No opportunity of falsehood and misrepresentation is lost. And if the representatives of the Democratic press were to be taken as true, the most accomplished of statesmen, and the most able of Christian heroes, and the ablest of men, causes were all confounded and baffled by a shallow charlatan.

There is no invention so puerile, no insinuation so contemptible, that it does not serve the purpose of political or personal hatred of one of the simplest and most honest of Presidents. The worst motives are attributed to the plainest actions, and every word and deed are laboriously and elaborately misinterpreted. The people of this country knew that General GRANT was not a politician when they elected him President. They did not expect from him the smooth evasions of a politician. They asked of him an honest adherence to the principles upon which he was elected and to the policy that sustained him. In a country necessarily controlled by parties it is undoubtedly a misfortune for a President to be unfamiliar with political persons and methods. But, on the other hand, many men field marshals in affairs are safer with a man of honest purpose and general ability, even without political experience, than with a mere politician.

The perils of trusting exclusively to a politician were shown in the case of Mr. CHASE. Down to the autumn elections of 1867, it was thought by many that Mr. CHASE ought to be the Republican candidate. Undoubtedly he thought so himself. He had been a conspicuous Republican leader. His course had been consistent. He had been in the van of the party. Every body knew that he coveted the Presidency, but every body conceded his ability and experience. "He understands politics," was the general remark. There was reason, however, who felt that circumstances designated General GRANT as the proper candidate, and he was selected by acclamation. But Mr. CHASE remained in May. In July, Mr. HORATIO SEYMOUR received from a Democratic convention, of which Mr. ALEXANDER HAMPTON was chairman, a nomination which he had meant to offer to Mr. CHASE; and while Mr. SEYMOUR was accepting it, he had in his pocket the speech which he had intended to make upon the nomination of Mr. CHASE. That Mr. CHASE was willing to receive such a nomination is the result of what is called "politics." Those who think that it is essential to good government are impatient of President GRANT. Those who were ready to hail Mr. CHASE as a great statesman contemptuously deny to General GRANT any statesmanlike quality.

But because a man is not, in the technical sense, "a statesman," it does not follow that he is destitute of common-sense, as seems to be assumed by the clumsy opponents of the President. General JACKSON was very far from being a statesman. Mr. LINCOLN's claims to statesmanship were derided. Probably Mr. MADISON and Mr. VAN BUREN would satisfy the technical requirements. But the good sense of General JACKSON and of Mr. LINCOLN could be trusted to save the country from wicked and absurd improprieties, and so may General GRANT's.

In these days of unscrupulous assertion in the press, a charge involving the honor and discretion of the President should be judged by the character of the paper that makes it. If it has shown that its desire for truth is evidently greater than its partisan or private hostility—if it is a journal of acknowledged respectability and honor and justice, its statements prejudicial to the President will be received with concern that they may have some grounds of truth. But if otherwise, its stories about the President will be as important as the assertion of a party committee that its party is the bulwark of the Constitution.

TAMMANY FIRE-WORKS.

THE Democratic members of Congress exhaust their party bitterness delightfully reclined in the draught through his high, comfortable rooms, that the mercury marked 84° in the Havana, 87° at Savannah, 92° at Washington, 95° at Long Branch, 100° at Springfield, and 108° in Maine, and he thinks, with the newspaper, how wonderfully the world must be at work pole. The White Mountains and Mesmphremagog have suddenly ceased to fascinate him.

Or he may take it in the cool of the evening, or, if that be considered too daring a figure of speech, in the shade of the evening, and is conveyed to the Thousand Troma's concert at the Central Park Garden. He will not, indeed, expect to pluck flowers in that garden, but he will not be disappointed in his expectation of sitting in a huge hall and listening to delightful music, as he smokes the light cigar— for he have not conquered that inveterate habit —or sips Bavarian lager. Then what pleasant summer dinners he may find—at not very many places indeed—pleasant dinners at most unpleasant prices! But would he help his purse by dining at a sea-side pavilion? A great exquisite says that the only fashionable resort he has left in extreme satisfactions. The citizen condemned to town for the summer may say that when he remembers to hear. There is always a shady side to the street. And if any day he be very warm he may revenge himself by reading in the morning paper that at Newport it is the hottest weather ever known, and that at Saratoga the heat is overpowering.

TRADE—ITS CONDITION AND PROSPECTS.

THE last two weeks of the month of June, and the first two of the month of July, are the worst for trade of the year. It is in this period during which the summer accounts of stock are taken, and arrangements are made for the fall season. Although the general trade of the country is affected by great improvements in transportation and by the telegraph, the fall trade continues to be vastly larger than the spring, and August and September remain the banner months. More dry-goods are sold in those two months than in any other two of the year. The principal cause of this superiority of the fall over the spring trade, in dry-goods, is not generally known, but those purchased for fall and winter consumption are more staple in their character, both as regards quality and color, and more adapted to the wants of the mass of customers. It has doubtless been generally noticed that the gossamer-like tissues, which are known as muslins and lawns, have been in less demand than usual this spring, and that their place has been supplied by more durable fabrics. As these delicate stuffs disappear from the counters, their place will be occupied by more substantial, and the latter are consequently regarded as valuable by authority in England, and which during the next cotton year, commencing on the 1st of September, England will be supplied at ante-bellum rates. These estimates have been followed by a reduction of the price both here and abroad; and, as a consequence, the manufacturer on this side sells his cloth largely under guarantee; that is to say, on the agreement, if the price made by the latter shall be reduced before the purchaser disposes of his goods, he is made a correspondent allowance. This feature of the dry-goods trade communicates some uncertainty to business. But it is probable that the goods dressed in August and September will be manufactured on the basis of about eighteen cents per pound for shillings, which is that cost with Cincinnati as but flooding the market with too many goods. In this way the effects of the anticipated decline may be avoided until the increased fears on which it is based may be better understood. The estimate of the American crop for this year has been augmented on the same side to three and a fifth millions of bales, which quantity, it is supposed there, will be exceeded by the growing crop. It will be seen how much of conjecture there is in the expected fall in price. As the South has been prudent in its finances, and has had the benefit of two prosperous crops, it may be in a condition to decide for itself what shall be paid for its staple. The consequence which may attend the question of price are too numerous to allow of certainty. The competition of India has not been conducted with the favorable results expected; and the South will have itself to blame if, by extending the quantity unduly, it shall enable this foreign rival to array its interests into the shape of active competitors with each other. A diffusion of industry, so as to embrace a larger production of food, would be a corrective. Great distress has at times been occasioned in India by answering the demand of Manchester for cotton, extending the culture of cotton. It has been done at the expense of an occasional famine. All of our knowledge of the extent of the production in India, and of the quantity exported to Europe, is derived from English sources, and it is conceded that there is a variance between the returns made by the Government Board of Trade and those published in the interest of dealers in Liverpool. This is a country where all is made soon obtain, is information of the India crop derived from a well-regulated consular establishment established on the plan of the English, so that, on its diffusion over the country, a judgment may be formed of the effect of the India crop on the whole production.

The subject of the foreign demand for our grain continues to possess great interest, but we remain in the mercy of the reports from our want of knowledge of the extent of the drought in Europe and the means of supplying the wants which it will occasion. As the grain ports on the Baltic and the Black Sea have been opened for some weeks, and a great effort is being made to obtain such supplies there as may affect the price here. The railroad communication from the interior of Russia with Odessa and with Theodosia or Caffa, ports on the Black Sea, has been extended, and some hopes are entertained of a considerable excess over the ordinary supply from that quarter. The region intended to be penetrated is suitable to wheat, and embraces a wide extent of country whose connection with water communication has not been good; but agriculture in Russia is conducted unskillfully by people who are slow to adopt changes, and it may be that only a small addition to shipments from the Black Sea will be made. The export of wheat from Russia in 1859 were 12,860,328 bushels, and from Odessa exceeded 16,000,000 bushels. Other ports send large quantities of wheat and flour abroad, but it is probable that Theodosia will grow into the most consequence in this respect. It is situated on the Crimea, and has the advantage of deep water and good anchorage. For military and economical reasons, Russia intends to make it a first-class port. With the facilities and progress of this region we ought to be made familiar through our consuls. It is equally a new campaign with India, and a powerful competitor in English markets for many of our agricultural productions.

The progress of the drought in England was arrested by copious rains on the 16th, which laid a wide extent; but it is certain that although the harvest wheat as a whole is good, that sown on sandy soils, or in the spring, can not recover. The hay crop, except when reached by frozen fogs, was badly damaged, and must produce a resort to grain to supply its place. The importance of the crop may be seen from the abstract from the money article of the Manchester Guardian, written in London on the 17th, which commences as follows:

"There is rather more firmness in the stock market, owing, in some measure, to the rain-fall of last night." It was this, and the occurrence of rain in the south of France, which induced the French buyers on the same day to resell a part of the wheat they had purchased on French account. But the exports of wheat and flour to Mavre from this port, for the week ending June 29, were equivalent to half a million bushels.

The Journal Officiel, of France, presents, among other extracts giving local information, this from the Progrès, of Lyons: "If there were any reason to doubt that the harvest in France would be less abundant this year than usual, it certainly will not be the case elsewhere. The wheat crops are most promising in England. In Southern Russia the cornfields look splendid, and prices have slightly fallen at Odessa, in consequence of the anticipated heavy crops. In Belgium, Holland, and Prussia, it is estimated that the harvest will be sufficiently abundant to meet the wants of those countries without resorting to supplies from abroad." But as late as the 27th of June a telegram from Berlin stated that "drought has been severe throughout Germany. Advices from all quarters as to the corn prospects are very discouraging." Another of the same date mentions that "the Journal de Liège says that the stock of the wooden lines of railway in France is firmer, owing to the increase of business expected from the transportation of American breadstuffs." These later advices, if true, indicate that the demand from the Continent for grain will be large, as it unquestionably must be from England. All this shall, it is fair to infer, have the benefit of a demand for our breadstuffs from those quarters until the harvest of 1871, although on the 28th of June No. 2 Milwaukee fell to $1 28, under supposed unfavorable advices, as well as from the results of heavy speculations at Chicago. It is unfortunate that this great interest is not protected with the sagacity, firmness, singleness of purpose, and power which are displayed in the disposal of cotton.

THE NEW FRENCH MINISTER.

M. PRÉVOST-PARADOL, the new French Minister to the United States, is now upon his way, and will be received by the hearty good wishes of the country to which he comes. The appointment of so distinguished a Liberal to so important a position is a plain indication of the wish of LOUIS NAPOLEON to prove to Frenchmen his own fidelity to his new policy, while he shows to Americans a wish to be represented by a gentleman who was a leader of the during the late great struggle in this country. M. PRÉVOST-PARADOL is a Liberal of the school of GUIZOT, and with more moderate opinions. He has been the skillful advocate of the great principles of constitutional liberty, as they are understood in England and in this country, the system very different from what is called republicanism. He is an accomplished scholar, eagerly versed in English political and literature, and speaking fluently the English language. He is a member of the Academy, to which he was welcomed in the usual complimentary to the empire, that the Government found great difficulty in reaching him. But upon one occasion the paper was suppressed, and the article of M. PRÉVOST-PARADOL's bitterly censured by the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Thus the author of the article should now be appointed American Minister by the Emperor, and that he should accept the appointment, show that he takes the view of the situation in France which is held by M. LABOULAYE. Between the liberalized empire and the chances of M. ROUHER there do not here seem to be, and supports the former as the better part of the imperious alternative. He has been joyously feasted by American gentlemen in Paris, including MR. READ, our Consul-General, and MR. THOMAS BALCH, long resident in that city, who enjoy friendly relations with leading Frenchmen. M. PRÉVOST-PARADOL will begin his mission with the best wishes and the best hopes, and it is peculiarly important to reflect that he comes as a friend in the actual, and not in the formal official sense.

MANIFEST DESTINY.

THOSE who think that it is the manifest destiny of this country to absorb all neighboring states, and that therefore it is folly to oppose any annexation project, should remember that although all children will at some time probably fall down stairs, it is neither wise nor necessary to push them down. That the extension of free governments upon this continent may be expected is undeniable, and that certain neighboring states "gravitate," as the phrase is in the United States is evident. That this is a real gravitation, arising from identity of intelligence and sympathy, may be questioned; that it is often a mere robbery is undeniable.

Manifest destiny was a popular cry, flattering to the popular pride, and originally used by the slave party that controlled the country. This was always the annexation party. The country could extend in one direction only, around the Gulf of Mexico, and that was the territory and the climate, and offered the general conditions favorable to the extension of slavery. MR. CALHOUN urged the annexation of TEXAS upon the ground that England would possibly otherwise obtain it, and blockade the slave ports of the South with free territory. What an argument for an American statesman! But this was the policy of the Democratic party, and MR. CALHOUN and his friends controlled that policy and the cry of manifest destiny was a convenient slogan for slavery.

But slavery being ended, the manifest destiny rhetoric has become much weaker. It is not much heard in the Southern States, and even upon the Pacific slope it is a very unswering note. A flourish is very well; but while, for instance, the Democratic party was very willing to use the slave-holding Rebellion as a means both the slave territory and population and the vote based upon slaves, the Democratic party is now especially anxious for Cuba, when, by the act of annexation, if not before, it would become free. The glory of indefinite extension has never appeared to the intelligent mass of the country; and when we "rounded our lines" with the ice of Alaska it was plain enough that the manifest destiny phrase had been overtreated enough in the popular heart to occasion any very hilarious rejoicing.

The policy of wise statesmanship in this country is not to seek extension—above all not to by it—and when it can not be avoided, to make the best of it. We can not easily hold colonies. The logic of our system and traditions requires equal States wherever the population is sufficient. To acquire the Sandwich Islands therefore, or to annex new States, and States which are for no reason desirable acquisitions. To extend the blessings of free government to mankind is undoubtedly part of our mission—but not to lose those blessings. If we mean to extend them we must prove them merely by example, rather than materially by absorption. There is no reason that we should extend them by bringing all the states in the world under our government. If annexation be our policy, we should seek it northward, not southward. But if we look to the strength and harmony of the Union, we shall certainly never aim at West Indian annexation.

EDUCATION IN ENGLAND.

THE debate upon the education bill in England will be of great advantage to that country if it produces no other result than the establishment of a general school system, which has never existed. British political thought so far outruns practice that it is not surprising to observe that the most radical reforms are proposed. There MR. FORSTER would have a pension compulsory, and the House of Commons by an immense majority refused to authorize the reading of the Bible as a part of the daily exercises. On the other hand, MR. GLADSTONE favored a provision which Rebuke any sectarian teaching in the schools to be established hereafter. But the proposition was signally defeated. This, however, is not surprising. It is not easy to see how it could have been. We must not expect that the government would free the schools from all ecclesiastical influence. It is not easy to see how it could be done. It will undoubtedly be some kind of compromise among the many pending propositions, establishing a system that will be simple and simple; partly paid and partly free; partly denominational and partly not. We observe that Professor GOLDWIN SMITH, in his address before the Cornell University, said that he believed the English movement would not finally be of the character to be called established the perfection of the secular principle in education. But it is very possible that, as England proceeds in the extension of the public service system, she may adopt the principle of compulsory education while we are still debating whether it is desirable. It is remarkable, true, as MR. G. F. HOAR stated in his recent admirable speech in the House of Representatives upon education as a measure of reform, a speech which should be universally diffused—that England has lately discovered how serious a practical injury her want of system in matters of education is. The moral of the Paris Exposition of 1867, and of the actual condition of Prussia, do not long leave us. The whole technical schools of the Continent, the enforced education of the whole people, have given such superiority to continental manufactures and agriculture, that the English jurors and exhibitors, upon careful consideration, admitted that some such system was essential to continued British ascendency. England will not disdain to learn a useful lesson, even of a military despotism. And with the same wisdom she might consent to learn in any school that can teach us, and not scornfully and pertinaciously refuse to learn because the civil service is to be taught wisdom by an "aristocracy."

THE GENTLEMAN FROM CHINA.

THE Chinese question renews itself from time to time, and upon the Pacific coast it is discussed with much feeling. Senator WILSON, of Massachusetts, also says that it seems as if capital had conspired to degrade labor in this country by inundating it with foreign ignorance. MR. FITCH and other gentlemen in the House were anxious to forbid the Chinese to become citizens. In the New York some representatives of the trades unions speak of opposing by force of arms the employment of the Chinese. Meantime certain facts may be wisely remembered. The country needs laborers.

It can wisely and profitably employ a great multitude more than it has. The population is very largely made up of immigrants, and, if we go back a little, we are all foreigners. Neither the principles nor the traditions of the government, nor the feelings of the people, could authorize the forcible exclusion of any foreigner honestly seeking to improve his condition by voluntary labor. The invitation of this country, which exhorts all mankind to come here and be happy.

It may be assumed, therefore, that the Chinese movement will continue. The trades unions may perplex the easy solution of the question, but they can not prohibit the immigration. If this be true, two things are evident. First, that the "cooly trade"—the enterprises of gentlemen like MR. COOPER-SCHOOP—should be absolutely prohibited. The voluntary movement can not be stayed; but the forced movement—the smuggling, we may call it, which, as we have heretofore shown, is the revival of the slave trade—should be strictly forbidden. Then the treatment of those who do come should be as honorable and generous as that which is accorded to the people of all other countries. Any attempt to outlaw the Chinese, to draw upon them a peculiar contumely, to treat them harshly and with personal abuse, would certainly be resented by the conscience and good sense of the country. The Government will do its duty if it rigorously interfere with the wholesale importation of these laborers. And if the whole subject is left to the operation of natural laws, freed from all forcing, we doubt if any honest American laborer need fear the result.

DOG-DAY DELIGHTS.

WHEN the dog-star rages, and the days and nights are what we have all recently known them to be, at the torrid apex of the year, the student of the almanac who can read between the lines discovers that this time last year "Calls for College Commencements." If we could ascertain the precise image of a Commencement which is most familiar to most persons, we should probably discover that it was a vision of a vast multitude fanning, gasping, and profusely perspiring in the air or church or theatre. A tradition haunts the Harvard Commencements that on an inexpressibly hot day, when the platform was crowded with grave counsellors of gymen, heavily swathed in thick woolen coats, listening, dripping, through hour after hour, to the oration of the graduates, one of the clerical brethren from the city, who was suffering liquefaction in the solemn company, turned severely to his neighbor, with a rising inflection in his voice, quoted the hymn,

"The heart, distrustful, asks if this be joy."

And so might the same heart ask at every Commencement celebration. But why should we not also ask, and with a rising inflection, until it is answered, why the Commencement should not be postponed until a season when our sweet, because not uncomfortable, sense? Undoubtedly the academical year is now arranged with reference to the present date. But the mere existence of a difficulty, the mere question of an abuse or a mistake, although constantly and stoutly pleaded as an argument in its favor, is not conceded to be such by intelligent persons. Why should the great and delightful festival of the college—the feast of reason, of memory, and of friendship, the day of days, and devoted to the tenderest and often most pathetic associations—fall hopelessly upon a time of the year when, by constant and long experience, is proved to be the most trying and disagreeable for the purpose? But, as it is confessed at the very moment of the inquiry, we observe that the Commencement of Brown University, which used formerly to be held in September, is now celebrated at the end of June! Those early September days were often hot. But the usual heat of September—what is it compared with the ferocity of midsummer?

Here in the city of New York there have been the Union Commencement and those of the College of New York and of Columbia College crowding each other. At the same time was the Cornell Commencement, and a little later are the great days at Union, at Hamilton, at Rochester, and Madison. Princeton, too, of an unusually genial temperature of feeling, sympathetically delights to hold her holiday with the mercury at 95°. We say delightfully, for is not that the way they do it? What "fate, free-will, foreknowledge absolute," compels the mother of orthodoxy to burn her reasoning children as she embraces them? We should be glad to see the College Review, the Cornell Era, and the many other excellent contemporaries upon which are especially devoted to the interests of the colleges, agitating this question. Let them begin the great reform. Let them in loud and imposing chorus declare that the dog-day Commencement is not "joy." Let them solemnly ask the graduates of the country and the authorities of colleges whether they have not resolution enough to insist, and power enough to provide, that they will be comfortable at Commencement.

NOTES.

IT has certainly been very warm; but probably very few of the best-informed citizens are aware that we have all just escaped being "deeply and irrevocably engulfed into the rumbling and brain-wave of the next earthquake." The truth is that the irate bowels of the upper earth are not the only ones we can attend to, which is, doubtless, the reason that we were ignorant of our possible doom. The weather, indeed, has been so warm that the bowels of certain gentlemen have become unsteady, and they straightway declare that there has been an earthquake. But for the bulk of the city, the convulsion, like that at Thrasimene, "reeled unheededly away." However, the heat was extraordinary, and required extraordinary treatment, and nothing could be more appropriate than the return that if something had happened which didn't happen, the vast American continent would have been "deeply and irrevocably engulfed into the rumbling and irate bowels of the nether earth." In which awful case how supremely would have been the remark of LUCAS's rude street-boy, accompanied with expressive gesture, that the young gentleman going to have a tooth drawn: "Won't there be a sore-e-a-a-ch nather!"

THE World thinks that Governor HOFFMAN's veto "calculated this statesman's reputation for light." It adds that "his keen sense of responsibility impels him to examine with scrupulous care any bill presented for his signature." It was this keen sense of responsibility and this scrupulous care probably, which induced "this statesman" to sign the Erie bill, one of the most monstrous acts of legislation ever perpetrated.

WHY are the good words "begin," and "beginning" thrown into such fatuity? They are old, indeed, and they have done a great deal of service; but they are strong and racy, and worth a dozen of the bastard "commence" and "commencement," which are intriguing against them.

He commenced to write," says the reporter. But the Bible mentions a better way: "From that time Jesus began to preach." Should we improve it—"began to," "From that time Jesus commenced to preach?" So at the very beginning of the Bible—or is it more elegant to say commencement of the Bible?—what do we read? Is it that in the commencement God made heaven and earth? Now precisely as much as these familiar and solemn passages would lose in force and spirit by substituting commence for begin, does every phrase lose by the same ill treatment. When we give, don't we let "donate," and when "commence" would work, do we not begin? Long words are no more elegant words than "big" pictures are high art.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

June 27.—In the Senate, the Tax bill came up, and the income tax sections were stricken out without a division. The pending question was made referred to the consideration of the Texas and Pacific Railroad bill, which was debated at length, and finally passed over. In the House the Ways and Means Committee came forth with a bill reducing the duties on all classes of salt fifty per cent. to take effect on the 1st of July next.

June 28.—In the Senate, the San Domingo treaty was under consideration.—In the House, a memorial from New York gentlemen, in favor of subsidizing the Tehuantepec Railroad, was presented.

June 29.—In the Senate, a motion to reconsider the Texas and Pacific Railroad bill was carried. The greater part of the session was devoted to the Tariff bill, which on this subject was brought up by Mr. SUMNER.

June 30.—In the Senate, the House bill to protect all naturalized citizens abroad was passed. A joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, authorizing a survey of the Tehuantepec and Nicaragua route for an interoceanic ship-canal. A protective tariff bill for Pennsylvania was rejected by a vote of 28 to 28.—The House non-concurred in the Senate amendments to the Tax bill, and proposition for the appointment of conference was agreed to on the points of disagreement.

July 1.—In the Senate, the Tax bill came up. The first question was the restoration of the income tax, for two years, at the rate of 2½ per cent., and a half per cent. The House tax amended substitute to the Senate Funding bill was agreed.

THE NEW ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

THE HON. AMOS T. AKERMAN, who has succeeded the Hon. Judge HOAR as Attorney-General of the United States, is a native of New Hampshire; but a residence of nearly thirty years in the South relieves him from the imputation of being a "carpet-bagger." He graduated at Dartmouth College, and immediately afterward went to Georgia, where he studied law in the office of Senator BERRIEN, who was Attorney-General under President JACKSON, and is to-day considered one of the leading lawyers of the South. Mr. AKERMAN'S first political distinction was attained in the late Constitutional Convention of Georgia, of which he was a prominent and active member. During the war he was an earnest Union man. In order to escape conscription into the rebel army, he accepted a nominal appointment in a Georgia regiment, but was not engaged in active service in the field. A writer in a Democratic paper, who professes to know him well, says of him: "I was placed in a position during our great conflict which brought me into curiously intimate relations with the few Unionists scattered through the South, and among them all there was not one man more devoted to the old flag than AMOS T. AKERMAN. Vastly as his principles differed from my own, I always respected the conscientious honesty with which he clung to them."

Mr. AKERMAN was one of the earliest and firmest friends of equal rights for all men. He is respected wherever he is known in the South, and his appointment has given very general satisfaction to the people of that section of the country, where the greater part of his life has been spent.

PUBLIC BATHS.

THE Commissioners of Public Works of New York have conferred a great benefit upon the community by opening free public baths in this city. There are two of these—one at the foot of Thirteenth Street, on the North River; the other at the foot of Fifth Street, on the East River. They are built of wood, and are commodious and in every way convenient. As our illustration shows, they do not differ essentially in external appearance from other floating baths; but inside they are cleaner and nicer, and more conveniently fitted up.

To these baths, under certain necessary restrictions, bathers of both sexes are admitted on alternate days, free of charge. The houses were thrown open to the public on the last day of June, and from early morning till dark there was a continued rush of men and boys to take advantage of this inestimable water privilege. At the East River house, before noon, 1,000 had embraced the opportunity afforded them; by 5 P.M., over 3000; between 7 and 8, nearly 5000. Of course none of these large numbers were all in together. About 200 can be comfortably accommodated in a batch, with room for a reasonable chance of exercise and evolution.

Our illustration represents the exterior of the East River establishment. The sketch was made July 1, when the bath was thrown open to women, by whom the privilege seemed to be no less heartily appreciated than by those of the other sex. The baths will be kept open until ten o'clock at night, and will be well lighted with gas.

PRETTY WOMEN.

LIFE becomes more harmonious, it beats with a keener pulse of enjoyment, in the presence of pretty women. After all, a charming face, a figure, a piquant little face, is the best remedy for half the ills of existence, its worries, its vexations, its dullness, its disappointments. And even in the larger and more placid types of beauty, in the beauty of a Lady Dunkello, if there is a tinge of stupidity, there is at any rate an atmosphere of repose, a genial influence moulding our social converse and habits into gentler shapes. It is amusing to see how the prettiness of woman tells on her dress, how the order and propriety of her dress tell on the home. The pursuit of beauty, the habit of prettiness, give an ideal dignity to the very arrangement of her bonnet-strings. In every movement, in the very sweep of her ample folds, in the pose of her languor, in the gay start of her excitement, one feels the softening, harmonizing influence of her last look in the glass. She may be gay or sorrowful, or quiet or energetic, but she must be pretty. Beauty exercises an imperceptible compulsion over her, which moulds her whole life into graceful and harmonious forms. Her dress rises out of the mere clothing of man into regions of science, of poetry, of art. A thousand considerations of taste, harmonies of color, contrasts, correspondencies, delicate adjustments of light and shade, dictate the choice of a shawl or the tint of a glove. And as prettiness tells on dress, it tells on the home. Flowers, pictures, the gay notes of a sonata, the easiest of couches, gorgeous hues of Indian tapestry, glass-work of Murano, a hundred exquisite somethings and nothings, are the natural setting of pretty women. The art of the boudoir tells on all but the chaos of the husband's study. Around the last refuge of barbarism floats an atmosphere of taste and refinement in which the pretty little wife lives and moves and has her being. And from this tone of the home grows the tone of society, the social laws of good-humor, of propriety, of self-restraint, of consideration for others, of gentleness, of vivacity. The very hush of the rough tones that have thundered over Peloponnesus as Pericles bends over Aspasia, the little turns and delicacies of phrase, the joyous serfdoms and idlenesses of the manliest and most energetic of men, tell of the triumph of pretty women.

THE STORY OF A SHIPWRECK.

CHAPTER III.

Getting the Stores Ashore.—A Needless Alarm.—Building the Hut.—Difficulty of procuring Materials.—The Thatch.—Arrangement of the Interior.

We left the shipwrecked party huddling together under a tarpaulin before a fire which they had contrived to build, and, as the storm was now beginning to abate, forming a plan for trying to get on board the wreck, in order to bring from it, if possible, some sails and cordage, by means of which they might construct something in the way of a tent for at least temporary shelter.

This plan was at once carried into execution, and it was entirely successful. Mr. Raynal, who was really the head of the party—the whole enterprise on which the vessel had been sent having been committed to his charge—was unable to accompany the others, having not yet recovered from his illness: but the captain and the three seamen went, leaving Mr. Raynal to take care of the fire, and, if he found himself able to do so, to prepare some food for them, to be ready on their return. They had a kettle which they had brought with them at their first landing. Mr. Raynal took this to a brook which was not far off, and after filling it with water, and bringing it back to the fire, he put a piece of salt meat in it from the stores which they had saved, and set it over the fire to be boiled.

In due time the men returned from the ship, bringing with them quite a store of treasures in the shape of sails, cordage, a few boards, and other simple materials for the construction of the tent. They also had procured a number of very essential tools—namely, two pickaxes, two shovels, a hammer, an axe, an adze, and a gimlet.

Considerably encouraged by their success, the men stopped a few moments at the fire, and then went into the woods to select a spot for their tent, which they prepared for this purpose with their pickaxes and shovels. They then came back to the fire, and, as the storm had now ceased, they remained there to eat the dinner which Mr. Raynal had prepared for them while they had been at their work. It consisted of boiled salt beef, ship-biscuit, and tea. After this repast they proceeded to the tent. Mr. Raynal, too feeble to walk along, leaned upon Captain Musgrave's arm. The others went to work at transporting the stores from under the tarpaulin to the tent, where they would be much more effectually sheltered.

The stores which they thus secured consisted of a cask containing about a hundred pounds of ship biscuit, and in another cask about fifty pounds of flour. There were about two pounds of tea, and three of coffee—each inclosed in a tin box—perhaps about ten pounds of sugar, a little salt meat, about a pound of pepper, half a bottle of mustard, a little salt, and last, though probably by no means least in the estimation of the sailors, six pounds of tobacco.

They had brought up a number of other articles from the hold after the ship struck, and had secured them upon the deck—such as a stock of kitchen utensils, several bags of salt, Captain Musgrave's chest, and a large kettle, which had been put on board the vessel to be used for trying out seal oil. All these things they had been obliged to leave behind when they escaped in the boat to the shore. But they had lashed them so securely that they remained undisturbed, and they now brought several of these articles safe to land.

By the time that all these things were conveyed to the tent, and properly stowed away, the day was well spent; and as the previous night had been a night of horror for them instead of sleep, they were in great need of repose. So they all went under the tent, and, getting into the least uncomfortable positions that they could find among the boxes and packages, they went to sleep. Fortunately for them, sailors are never dependent for the soundness of their slumbers on the comforts of their bed.

Before a great while they were all aroused by a noise in the thickets around the tent. The noise consisted of a great rustling among the branches of the trees, and of something trampling over dry sticks and dead leaves, accompanied by sounds of hard breathing, with now and then a grunt, indicating that something quite extraordinary was going on. The men, alarmed, sprang up from their slumbers, and seizing what weapons there were at hand, hurried out to ascertain what was the matter. Aleck grasped the axe, and each of the others laid hold of whatever he could find that would serve for a club. On going out from the tent they found that the noise was made by seals that were scrambling in great numbers through the thickets to their various nests and lodging-places, where they were to spend the night.

Most of the animals were going along peaceably enough, and evinced no evil intentions; but there were two immense sea-lions that were engaged in mortal combat, though what had excited their hostility against each other did not appear. They were of enormous size, and the conflict between them was terrible. They raised themselves up against each other, and bit and tore each other in a frightful manner. The men wished to stop the fight, in order that they might themselves return into the tent again, and sleep in peace. In order to do this, and to drive the brutes away, George or Harry proposed to go to the fire, and bring some burning fire-brands, and throw at them. This plan succeeded. The beasts, terrified by fire, let go of each other, and fled in different ways into the thickets.

The night passed away without any further disturbance, and the men slept as well as they could till morning. But the ground was damp beneath them, and their clothes had not yet been dried; they discovered, moreover, that they had been obliged to lie were so uncomfortable that when they rose in the morning they found that they had been very little refreshed by their slumbers. Their limbs were benumbed and stiff, and their sense of weariness and fatigue was greater than when they lay down.

On going out of their tent it appeared that the seals had all left the thickets, and had gone back to the sea, in order, no doubt, to commence their day's work of fishing. After a little time, however, the men came in sight of one that had for some reason been left behind, and they immediately set off in pursuit of him, in order to see what they could make of his flesh for food.

He led them a long chase, however, before they could secure him. One would think, from the conformation of the limbs of these animals, that such would seem to be adapted solely to the water, that they would be very helpless on land. But this is by no means so. The seal in this case made his way through and among the thickets faster than the men could follow him. They met instead with several times when they were entangled among briers, or were stopped by the trunk of a fallen tree. At length, however, they succeeded in capturing and killing him, and not long afterward they were seen coming back toward the tent, each bringing a mass of the flesh on his shoulders.

They hung one of these pieces over the fire, and left Mr. Raynal to watch it, and to keep it turning by means of a stick, while the rest concluded to take advantage of the low tide to go on board the ship. Their object was to see if they could not recover and bring to the shore some more of the articles which they had brought up from the hold and left upon the deck, on the night of the wreck, for fear of loading their little boat too heavily. They were quite successful in this expedition, and returned about noon, bringing with them quite a number of articles which were likely to be of great use to them, such as the great kettle, and several other kitchen utensils, the ship's compass, the chronometer, their several chests, and some empty casks. They were very glad to get the chronometer, and to find that it was uninjured. It had not even stopped.

When they had carefully put away these articles in the tent, they set themselves to the task of eating their dinner of roasted seal. A pretty hard task they found it; for the flesh was dark, coarse-grained, and oily, and was equally unpleasant to the taste and to the smell. But, as Mr. Raynal said, they knew that they should have to accustom themselves to such food, and so they went bravely through it.

As soon as the most urgent and immediate necessities of the party were thus supplied, Captain Musgrave and Mr. Raynal had time to reflect a little upon their situation, and to consider what they were to do. The only possible chances of escape, as it appeared to them then, were two. First, that toward the end of the season a vessel might come in search for them, according to an arrangement which had been made to this effect with the owners of the Gryphon, who had bound themselves to send another vessel out to look for this party in case they should not return before the end of four months; secondly, that some chance vessel passing that way might discover and rescue them. The probability of their being saved by a vessel accidentally passing they knew was small, as the island on which they were wrecked was situated in the midst of very remote and unfrequented seas. There was every probability that they would have to remain on the island several months, even if they were ultimately rescued; and it became, therefore, of great importance to them to construct a more permanent dwelling than the tent. For the tent, although it had been invaluable to them for the time being, as a partial and temporary shelter, afforded no effectual protection from either wind or rain; and should a violent tempest occur it might at any moment be carried entirely away from over their heads.

So they determined to see what they could do in the way of building a house.

They appointed Mr. Raynal, who had some knowledge of mechanics, superintendent of the work. He was, moreover, not yet strong enough to render much aid in any other way. He formed the plans, and the men immediately engaged in the execution of them. The labor required was very great, since every thing connected with the procuring and transportation of the materials was to be done by the unaided strength of the four men; and they had very few tools to use in the construction, and no nails for the fastenings. It was many weeks before the hours, or rather cabin, was finished; but the work was accomplished at last, and it furnished the party, during the time they remained upon the island, quite a comfortable habitation. The engraving gives a correct view of the form and construction of the building, and also of the situation which they chose for it.

They could find no straight trees upon the island of sufficient size for the frame-work. There were large trees of a certain kind; but they were so gnarled, knotty, and crooked in their forms that they could do nothing with them in the way of carpentry, however beautiful some of the wood might have been for ornamental work, in finishing or fancy furniture. So they were obliged to depend for timber on the materials which they could procure from the masts and spars of the wreck.

With these, which they floated on shore when the water was smooth, and then conveyed, with infinite labor, to the place which they had selected for their building, they formed the frame. It consisted of strong posts set deep into the ground at the four corners, with beams connecting them above, and also of other posts set up in a leaning position on each side, to act as braces to furnish an additional security against the violence of the wind. There were also two posts set up, on the middle of each end of the building, to support the ridge-pole. They found in the woods poles sufficiently large to serve as rafters, and also to form a kind of lattice-work for the roof and the sides, necessary as a support for the thatch which was to form the inside covering.

The making of this thatch was a very tedious and even painful operation. They were obliged to use for this purpose, instead of straw, a plant which grew upon the island—the only one which could be procured in sufficient quantities to answer their purpose—but which was armed, along the sides of its stems and leaves, with sharp, serrated edges, which cut the hands of the men so much in gathering and tying them, that they were obliged several times to stop the work, in order that their hands might recover from the excessive soreness the contact of the plants occasioned.

For, besides the work of gathering a sufficient quantity of the material, they were obliged to form it into very compact bundles of about the size and length of a man's arm, for convenience of laying upon the building, and to tie these bundles with cords, which they obtained by untwisting ropes procured from the rigging of the ship. They were obliged to make a very great number of these bundles; for the dimensions of the building were about twenty-two feet by sixteen, and the eaves, in the sides and roof, a large surface to be covered by the thatching. The whole number of bundles which they had to make they found, on counting them, was about nine thousand!

When the bundles were made they began to lay them, lashing each bundle to the latticework, and covering each tier over the one below it, so as properly to carry off the rain. They had to contrive a door in this way with a wooden frame, until the whole thickness was about a foot.

To protect this thatching more effectually from violent winds, they nerved it to the rafters below by means of a long needle, which they formed out of wood, and strong twine for thread, and then placed over the whole two beams of wood, one on each side, which also they secured in a very firm manner by proper lashings. Large holes two or three small openings in different parts of the side and end walls for windows. These they contrived to glaze with the sashes obtained from the cabin windows of the vessel.

Mr. Jaber explained in considerable detail the manner the walls and roof of the cabin were very great, and the work occupied many weeks; but the perplexities and special difficulties which they had to encounter become much more serious when they came to the construction of the fire-place and chimney. But they succeeded, at last, after the guidance of Mr. Raynal's ingenuity and skill, in surmounting them all. They built the chimney of flat stones, which they collected with great labor and pains from the shore, considerable distance around the spot. They were for a long time at a loss to determine what to do for a cement, since the stones, though they were the best that they could find, were not sufficiently flat in form to lie entirely together, without something to unite them. They could not find any clay, or any other kind of cement on earth. Finally, however, Mr. Raynal conceived the idea of manufacturing some lime by employing the heat to extract a great quantity of it from the shores, and burning them. The plan succeeded perfectly well. Of course the process was very slow; but after a time a sufficient quantity of lime was produced, which, when mixed with wet sand to form a mortar that answered the purpose perfectly for the fire-place, though it would have been impossible to have used it except in that way high enough above the thatching of the roof.

Mr. Raynal, finding his experiment of manufacturing lime so successful, subsequently conceived the idea of attempting to make bricks of the sand, it seems, when they first landed, and were thinking only of having their lives from day to day, had put their clothes very much into their wash with oil in bringing home on their shoulders or in their arms masses of the flesh of the seals which they had killed at a distance from the tent. No washing with water would remove this oil, and the clothes were in such a condition in consequence of it that it was almost impossible to wear them. So Mr. Raynal made a great quantity of soda by burning up a large fire for many days. These ashes he leached through a cask, with great labor lored in the bottom of it, and with the lye thus produced, and a proper quantity of seal oil, he manufactured a supply of soap which answered perfectly well to clean the clothing, and was afterward a great means both of comfort and health to the men while they were to stay on the island.

But to return to the chimney. Finding that it would be impossible to build up a chimney of masonry with such materials as they had, they finally concluded to make a smaller copy out of the copper sheathing of the vessel, provided they found that they could strip the sheathing off for this purpose.

Mr. Raynal contrived to make a tool by which the copper could be detached from the keel at bottom. He manufactured this tool in some way from a sleeker bar of iron which formed part of the rigging connected with the lower mast-head of the vessel, and with this bar stripped off the sheets of copper carefully preserving all the nails, and brought the copper and the nails on shore.

In the mean time the others at the cabin and top four posts of the four corners, and made a great stone fire-place, inclining them toward each other above, so as to bring the upper ends at the proper distance apart from the chimney above. Then they nailed the sheets of copper to these posts, thus forming a space for the passage of the smoke from the fire. When the work was finished they built a fire in the fire-place, and found that their chimney carried the smoke perfectly well.

They thought it would be necessary for them, both for health as well as comfort, to have a floor to the cabin, as the ground seemed to be every where covered to a considerable depth with the spongy sort of moss or peat, which was often entirely saturated with water, and was very cold and dry—that is, never when left to itself. Whenever the men built a fire in the open air, the ground beneath was found to be composed to so great a degree of vegetable matter that, after being dried by the heat, it took fire, and would burn to a considerable depth. So true was this that before commencing to build their fire-place they were obliged to dig out this vegetable soil to a considerable depth, and to a considerable extent in each direction, and then to fill up the cavity with stones, in order to form an incombustible foundation for their chimney.

They succeeded in finding trees in the woods with stems straight enough and large enough for sleepers to lay their floor upon, and they obtained from the vessel boards enough to cover them.

When the cabin was thus completed, the next thing was to furnish it. The dimensions of the building were, as has already been said, about twenty-two feet long by sixteen wide. The door opened in the middle of one of the sides—consequently, the side that was turned away from the sea, and was most sheltered by the neighboring rocks. The fire-place was opposite to it. Then the door and the fire-place divided the cabin into two equal halves. The part on the right hand was appropriated to Captain Musgrave and Mr. Barnul, their two beds being placed in the two corners. Between these, at the end of the cabin, they placed a kind of box, which they brought from the cabin of the vessel, and which divided within into two portions, and had a separate cover for each. These compartments, projecting in front and over the ends in such a manner as to form a very convenient table for writing and other such purposes. Mr. Barnul and Captain Musgrave made this their desk, and the office for the transaction of business. Over it they put rude shelves which they contrived to put up and fasten to the trellis-work, they placed the instruments and books which they had brought from the vessel, and they hung a small looking-glass near.

They even established a library here by appropriating one shelf to such books as they found in their chests, consisting of a Bible, a copy of "Paradise Lost," and two or three well-worn English novels with many leaves missing.

The other part of the hut, to the left of the door and fire-place, was appropriated to the use of the forecastle men. One of these beds was placed at the end, and the other two at the sides, ranged against the walls. Above the door on that side, and near the foot of one of the beds, was a small table used for what in ordinary housekeeping would be called the kitchen work. There were shelves above this table to hold the few culinary utensils they possessed, and also for hanging. There was no room for rude construction, being made of tin cans which had contained provisions, and which the cooks were made of twisted strings, and the blubber of the sea-lions furnished the oil. In the middle of the cabin, between the door and the fire-place, they set a large permanent table made of planks, supported upon a single post, and with a bench. This table was made low, so that it served the purpose of a bench to sit upon as well as a table.

In the division which was thus made incidentally, as it were, in the interior of the cabin by the door and the fire-place, they placed a bench between them, and in the appointment of the parts to the different occupants, the distinction of rank, or rather of duties, was always unconsciously recognized even in this dire extremity of want and danger. On the side of the cabin, those of the officers, the other that of the men. One side was the seat of the intelligence, the direction—the other, of execution, or of the labor of labor, of obedience, of execution. This was done unconsciously, without conscious act—a thing of course, as it were, for time to which the arrangement made to form any compact or arrange any organization, but at the moment that the vessel was abandoned, were no longer under the authority of the captain, but each one was entirely free; and the spirit of subordination which they had thus far manifested was a form of that instinctive submission of the weak and the ignorant to those whom they consider the intelligent and the strong, which constitutes an essential part of the structure of the human race and mod, and is doubtless the origin and germ from which all human government springs.

D'IZZY DIZZY.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

The Right Honorable Benjamin Disraeli, formerly known to the London newspapers as plain "Dizzy," has written a book; and a book he has been which, if it were not a book, would not stand in awe. When a member of Parliament and a British Premier lays his thunder by, and comes down into the arena of literature, it is meet, right, and the bounden duty of all lesser gladiators to look on and admire. Dizzy has a big art. High, indeed, is this great statesman's art—so high that, as our title intimates, we fear he has overleaped himself. Dizzy, himself, bewildered by the splendor which his own pen has evoked, has produced a gorgeous, confusing, sunglory, such inexhaustible magnificence, such unimaginable wealth, seen in America outside the columns of the New York Herald and the Police of our Cotton. Certainly Mr. Disraeli approves himself to be what the Japanese call "a big man wardly." His very names strike terror into the beholder. When we have turned from the Book to the title-page, and have read that Dizzy, broken which bound us to common life, and we henceforth walk with him, converse only with Coningsbys and Theodoras, with Alberthas, St. Aldegondes, Dukes of Brecon, Lords of Culloden and Castlemaine, and the Blairmhor estates under the pressure, forgets its own christening, and brings forth the appropriate heights of an English family whose sole sorrow is that their ancestors made a low marriage with a Euphrosyne Cantaccuzene, Greek emperors, and hundreds of thousands of pounds!

The society of "Lothair" is equal to its mesmerizer. Let us put off our own shoes from off our feet. The very grooms are respectfully haughty and calmly graceful. How shambling, shame-faced, and awkward must we of the common lot seem to these aristocratic gentlemen's gentlemen! Simply for our peace of mind, we see but little of them. "Lothair" is, as it should be, made of solider stuff. We have not yet had to plump into a nest of nobles. The Duchess is singularly beautiful, and gifted with native grace of thought which needs no gift with anybody, grace we are not informed. Her husband is as distinguished as he looks. All their children, strange to say, are a reproduction of their parents. All are alike distinguished, and fully equal to anything. Every day, therefore, when this noble Duke looks into the glass, and gives the last touch to his aristocratic toilet, he offers his graceful thanks to Providence that his family are not unworthy of him!—an act of devotion which reminds us of the gentleman whose religious meditations were said to consist of an attempt to discover whether he made the Almighty, or the Almighty made him!

The one inconvenience of this high-toned duke is, that so many heiresses have married into his family and left thereon so many princely domains that, after the manner of the princes who lived in a shoe, he has so many palaces he does not know what to do. Then comes Lothair and makes a sixth—more, till the ducal embarrassment may be better imagined than described.

But the duke does not monopolize magnificence either in building or beauty. We leave Lothair—they all call each other by their Christian's England—with the large violet eyes and the rich dark hair and the radiant form of Clare Arundel, and we find the park in which Lady St. Jerome, who is never seen to greater advantage than in her own grounds, is entertaining her sad circumstances, and who is absolutely fascinating when it comes to lobster sandwiches. Anon we find Lothair among the sumptuous Cavey Hoses, in company with royalty, followed by the inspiring presence of Theodora, and escorted by a group of dazzling duchesses and paladins of high degree, in a choice saloon hung with rose-colored silk and ornamented by chandeliers of crystal, and served from gold plate; and, added to the delightful scene, we have the host, who "Never was such an elegant cluster." (Cluster. Heavens! do the quality cluster? Is there society in which one can say en masse cluster?) If a lady is overturned on a heap of stones in the king's highway, she is sure to be of a singularly distinguished family, with a face as divine as that of Aphrodite, and a form as graceful as that of Hebe, or obedience, of execution. This was done unconsciously, without conscious act—a thing of course, as it were, for time to which the arrangement made to form any compact or arrange any organization, but at the moment that the vessel was abandoned, were no longer under the authority of the captain, but each one was entirely free; and the spirit of subordination which they had thus far manifested was a form of that instinctive submission of the weak and the ignorant to those whom they consider the intelligent and the strong, which constitutes an essential part of the structure of the human race and mod, and is doubtless the origin and germ from which all human government springs.

D'IZZY DIZZY.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

The Right Honorable Benjamin Disraeli, formerly known to the London newspapers as plain "Dizzy," has written a book; and a book he has been which, if it were not a book, would not stand in awe. When a member of Parliament and a British Premier lays his thunder by, and comes down into the arena of literature, it is meet, right, and the bounden duty of all lesser gladiators to look on and admire. Dizzy has a big art. High, indeed, is this great statesman's art—so high that, as our title intimates, we fear he has overleaped himself. Dizzy, himself, bewildered by the splendor which his own pen has evoked, has produced a gorgeous, confusing, sunglory, such inexhaustible magnificence, such unimaginable wealth, seen in America outside the columns of the New York Herald and the Police of our Cotton. Certainly Mr. Disraeli approves himself to be what the Japanese call "a big man wardly." His very names strike terror into the beholder. When we have turned from the Book to the title-page, and have read that Dizzy, broken which bound us to common life, and we henceforth walk with him, converse only with Coningsbys and Theodoras, with Alberthas, St. Aldegondes, Dukes of Brecon, Lords of Culloden and Castlemaine, and the Blairmhor estates under the pressure, forgets its own christening, and brings forth the appropriate heights of an English family whose sole sorrow is that their ancestors made a low marriage with a Euphrosyne Cantaccuzene, Greek emperors, and hundreds of thousands of pounds!

The society of "Lothair" is equal to its mesmerizer. Let us put off our own shoes from off our feet. The very grooms are respectfully haughty and calmly graceful. How shambling, shame-faced, and awkward must we of the common lot seem to these aristocratic gentlemen's gentlemen! Simply for our peace of mind, we see but little of them. "Lothair" is, as it should be, made of solider stuff. We have not yet had to plump into a nest of nobles. The Duchess is singularly beautiful, and gifted with native grace of thought which needs no gift with anybody, grace we are not informed. Her husband is as distinguished as he looks. All their children, strange to say, are a reproduction of their parents. All are alike distinguished, and fully equal to anything. Every day, therefore, when this noble Duke looks into the glass, and gives the last touch to his aristocratic toilet, he offers his graceful thanks to Providence that his family are not unworthy of him!—an act of devotion which reminds us of the gentleman whose religious meditations were said to consist of an attempt to discover whether he made the Almighty, or the Almighty made him!

The one inconvenience of this high-toned duke is, that so many heiresses have married into his family and left thereon so many princely domains that, after the manner of the princes who lived in a shoe, he has so many palaces he does not know what to do. Then comes Lothair and makes a sixth—more, till the ducal embarrassment may be better imagined than described.

But the duke does not monopolize magnificence either in building or beauty. We leave Lothair—they all call each other by their Christian's England—with the large violet eyes and the rich dark hair and the radiant form of Clare Arundel, and we find the park in which Lady St. Jerome, who is never seen to greater advantage than in her own grounds, is entertaining her sad circumstances, and who is absolutely fascinating when it comes to lobster sandwiches. Anon we find Lothair among the sumptuous Cavey Hoses, in company with royalty, followed by the inspiring presence of Theodora, and escorted by a group of dazzling duchesses and paladins of high degree, in a choice saloon hung with rose-colored silk and ornamented by chandeliers of crystal, and served from gold plate; and, added to the delightful scene, we have the host, who "Never was such an elegant cluster." (Cluster. Heavens! do the quality cluster? Is there society in which one can say en masse cluster?) If a lady is overturned on a heap of stones in the king's highway, she is sure to be of a singularly distinguished family, with a face as divine as that of Aphrodite, and a form as graceful as that of Hebe, or sande. It begins immediately to pass rapidly with Clare, whose violet eyes prove as fascinating as Lady St. Jerome's lobster sandwiches. In short, he is irresistibly drawn to her. He believes that the counselor he needs is Miss Arundel. The two put their heads together—to say nothing of their hearts—and conclude that the salvation of the country and the restoration of true religion depend upon the building of a huge cathedral in Westminster. Unluckily, before the plans of the cathedral are matured Lothair is obliged to leave Venice, and, when he has returned in a week it seems to him a year; but Lady Corisande heaves in sight again, and again she becomes to this gay Lothario irresistibly captivating, and we hear him sighing, "Delicious Brentham!" till Theodora is thrown upon the bosom of Lothair, when both Clare and Corisande quietly disappear, and Lothair gazes upon Theodora—Theodora, who claims that she lives only for duty and the affections—Theodora, of such a countenance as he had read in Grecian busts, in Catholic temples, in fanes of Ephesus, in the radiant shadow of divine groves. Now is the air full of Theodora. Lothair is restless. Lothair sighs, shrinks from society, absents himself from dinners, takes long walks without purpose, and before a week is out falls into sonnets and reveries, with a hair-brush in each hand, conjuring up all that had passed since the memorable morn when she appeared to him by the road-side until the last dark hour when they parted. (And ah! why could not life be ever passed in a moment!) It is a little surprising that though Lothair is immensely disturbed by the appearance of Theodora's friend, he is in no wise put about by Theodora's husband. He is greatly relieved by finding that Theodora's friend has a wife, but seems to need no relief from the thought that Theodora is herself a wife. Perhaps it is a key to it the account of his "sweet and innocent nature," or perhaps he may have been influenced by the luxurious costume of the Count. It is, as such, the discouraged Premier assures us, as no language can describe; or perhaps it is the soaps which she gave him in delicate cups of Severes china, or the wines in golden glass of Venice, or the cushions—oh, those cushions! are but as the turkeys of New Hampshire or the shad of the Connecticut to Providence.

What would have come of it all it is difficult to surmise, had not a rawbon shot—an "occasional bullet"—removed Theodora from the scene. "And now," she says, having sent away her too-complying husband to bring Lothair alone to her dying bed—"And now, my cousin, me, for I wish that your spirit should be upon me as mine departs"—an arrangement by which her husband appears to have offered no objection. Hereupon Lothair repairs to the two Greek impossible saints on the Appian isle, and finds them equally attractive. Their extraordinary beauty and unwearied care of him through the list—and bill—is captivate him. He begins to feel happy, and to wish that his life might never change, when, suddenly, Lady Agathodore comes and all changes it—for Lothair hears, like the Turk, no brother near his throne—and he remembers that this Greek bearing gifts of pocket-handkerchiefs, choice scents, and fancy dogs to the fascinating sisters. Unable to cope with them, and that he leaves the isles of Greece and returns, like a bad penny, to Venice and Corisande, where, serving that some of the happiest hours of his life have been spent at Venice; but Clare Arundel is about to take the veil, and "Clare, who is not a friend left in the world," exclaims the despairing and multifarious lover. He pronounces it barbarous and unwise, for Theodora's death has appeared to him and warned him against turning Catholic, and Miss Arundel in the flesh is no match for Theodora in the spirit. Having thus disencumbered himself—speaking after the manner of Dissenters—of "Clare who is not a friend," he proceeds to walk in Lady Corisande's garden with Lady Corisande, and has time to get to inform that young person that to one he has been constant, "in one [spring] I am unchanged—and that is, my adoration of Corisande."

The young person can not have been so well informed of Lothair's career as we, or she would would have turned pale—or, rather, she would have stopped at that. But, with her limited information, after raising pale and blushing, she gently took his arm, and then she hid her face in his bosom.

And then Lothair did what, we venture to say, no lover ever did before, either in or out of a novel.

"He soothed and sustained her agitated frame, and sealed with an embrace her speechless form. Then, with gentle thoughts and words of feeling to him, he induced her to resume their stroll, which both of them now wished might endure to be undisturbed."

Here we are forced to confess ourselves in wilderness mazes lost. Soothing and sustaining an agitated frame seems a rather anatomical cases, and we can fancy Lady Corisande objecting, like Mr. Venus's inamorata, that she does not wish to regard herself, nor yet to be regarded, in that lowly light; still, Lothair's action is not wholly incomprehensible; but how to form can be sealed, and how it can be sealed by an embrace, and how a form already speechless can need sealing, and why a form should be either speechless or speaking, are questions undreamed of in our philosophy. But we are not Southrons — we have no vast experience of the South. We are Yankees. And to whom did the soft thoughts and softer words belong? Did Corisande cling to Lothair with all this softness, or did Lothair use it to induce Corisande, like poor Jess, to moon on? And, when we are about it, what, pray, are soft thoughts?

And this, with a strong infusion of Irish Fenianism and Italian revolution is "Lothair," the work of an English scholar and statesman. Inscrutable are the ways of man. If it were the production of a Yankee, so that we were free to pronounce an opinion, we should say that with the exception of an occasional pithy and pungent sentence, it is dreamy, vapid, and flavorless to the last degree. We should say that this Yankee's hero was a milksop, was a stick, was all things wooden and insipid; that he was not saved from being puppets only by being souls; that his women are almost without exception "matter too soft a lasting mark to bear, and best distinguished by black, brown, or fair;" that he is a writer of a stiff and affected style; his sarcasm has no merit but malice, and his praise no merit at all; that his love is without passion, his enthusiasm being absorbed in his millinery; that the story is rambling, incoherent, tiresome, and that the way to read it should be sure our Yankee, with Yankee shrewdness, that his novel would not sell, and would do him small credit, did not sell; that he might publish with ease and painstaking, write respectable essays, or keep a boarding-house certainly do well in the dress-making or house-furnishing line: but that story-telling of such sort would prove his certain ruin in this world, and an extremely hazardous venture for the next.

Mr. Disraeli is not a Yankee. Nor is there any thing in his book which should induce us to fasten upon him the opposing epithet. He is a Jew, and did it; that he might write, and he has made a hundred thousand dollars by his book. We therefore die and give no sign.

THE LOVELY RIVERS AND LAKES OF MAINE.

Oh, the lovely rivers and lakes of Maine!
I am charm'd with their names, as my song will prove;
Their
Aboriginal names inspire my strain,
And I sing of the rivers and lakes of Maine—
From Cupsuptic to Cheputnaticook,
From Sagadahock to Passamaquoddy,
Ipmuock, Ipmuock,
Ipmuock, Ipmuock,
From Sagadahock to Pobesquamook.

For light serenading, the "Blue Musette," Bonnie Dundee," and "Yankee Doodle" do very well:
But rivers of Maine, in their wild solitudes,
Bring a thunderous sound from the depth of the woods;
The Aroostook and Chimenticook,
The Chimpanee and Chiquenabanticook—
Tomhook, Tomhook,
Chiquenabanticook,
The Chimpanee and Chiquenabanticook.

Behold! how they sparkle and flash in the sun!
The Matteewahsog and the Musseuguu;
The bright Penobscot, with its forks and prongs,
Kennebec, Kennebago, and Sebasticook;
The pretty Presquisle and gay Tulnbic;
The Eaz-pahquoag and little Schoodic—
Schoodic, Schoodic,
The little Schoodic,
The Eaz-pahquoag and little Schoodic.

Yes, yes, I prefer the bright rivers of Maine
To the Rhine, the Loire, the Seine, the Saone or the Seine.
Who'd sigh do for the cockney; but give me some good
Indian name,
Such as Ammonoosuc or the Wytopadiook,
Or the Umsaskis or the Ripogenis,
The Ripogenis or the Piscataquis—
Squois, squois,
The Piscataquis,
The Ripogenis or the Piscataquis.

"Away down South," the Cherokee
Has named his rivers in the Tennessee,
The Shenandoahcoe and the Ocmulgee,
The Congaree and the Ohoopee—
But what are they to Percy Detroit,
To the Passadumkeag or the Wasentoquoit—
Squoit, squoit,
The Wasentoquoit,
To the Passadumkeag or the Nicatoquoit?

Then turn to the beautiful lakes of Maine
(To the Sage of Auburn be given the strain),
Their waters are grains and bright fancy makes
The earth's highest glories to shine in its lakes);
What lakes one of Mere-coque in place in the book
With the Matagomon and the Pangokomook—
Omook, Omook,
The Pangokomook,
With the Matagomon and the Pangokomook?

Lake Lemar, or Como, what care I for them,
Or the lake that is Moosehead or Winnipesaukeam,
And, sweet as the dews in the violet's kiss,
Wallakenpaugamaus and Pocksha,
And then I'm chaste as the frozen snows
On the Moosetookmaguntic or Mollunkunk—
Amuuk, Amuuk,
Or Mollunkunk,
On the Moosetuckmaguntic or Mollunkunk!

And Maine has the Eagle lakes, Chaupenagan,
And the lilies that bloom on the Scopan,
The spreading Sebago, the Cungomgomoni,
The Millikenett and Mooselem,
Cortlon and the fair Apmonjenagamook,
Aquassac and rare Wetokenebacook—
Accuk, Accuk,
Wetokenebacook,
Oquassac and the Wetokenebacook.

And there are the Pokebenie and Pat'quongomiti
And there is the pretty Cosscongmuntic,
Aquadocta, Pemadumcook, Chesuncook,
The Pemadumcook and the old Chesuncook,
And the Umbazookskus and Seraubocook.
Skuk, Skuk,
The Syalabobsis,
The Umbazookskus or the Syalabobsis.

Oh! give me the rivers and lakes of Maine,
In her mountains or forests or fields of grain,
In the depth of the shade or the blaze of the sun,
The lakes of Schoodic and the Bacconegan,
And the dear Wanhassee and the clear Aqueesee,
The Caubocoscook and Millinocket—
Klunk, Klunk,
The Millinocket,
The Caubocoscotic and Millenkinok!

THE BRITISH CABINET.

THE picture on the following page gives an interesting view of a session of the British Cabinet. One distinguished member of that body, Lord CLARENDON, whose portrait appears in the composition, has died since the picture was engraved. The sessions of the Cabinet are secret, and of course the picture, with the exception that the room is faithfully portrayed and the heads are all accurate portraits, is purely an imaginative creation. It is a stiff and professional wisdom characterizes the assembled statesmen, and would not contribute much to a popular observer if he failed to recall the witty saying of the Chancellor D'ORKNEYITES: "My son, you have no idea how little wisdom it takes to be governed." Even a British Cabinet may look much wiser than it is.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

A "HEATED TERM" is theoretically lauded to three days; practically, June disdained all ordinary bounds and restraints, and exercised her life away in such a way that midsummer have proved an endless series of hot days. Dismal as it was, it was not a safe or sanitary disposition as the June of 1870 has shown herself. In New York city it was warmer on some days by twelve or fourteen degrees than it was in New Orleans, the West, and other Southern cities. Many deaths occurred last week from sun-stroke, and those whose trade compelled them to be exposed to the scorching rays suffered intensely.

In the midst of all the discomforts of the heat came an additional grievance to the public. There was an increased demand for ice, and so the dealers thought they would increase their prices. Consequently many a poor family found it was forced to go without that luxury which is almost a necessity, in a heated term, to-wit. The dealers have since come down to a normal misfortune to our citizens. It is said that there is really an immense supply for all possible exigencies of the ice-houses. If this be so let us have more competition another year, more ice companies or make an artificial ice, or do something, so that we need not be at the mercy of any monopolists.

The taking of the census is beginning to develop curiosities. A Switzerland German in one of the most densely populated districts in the Seventeenth Ward displayed a most profound ignorance in regard to geographical matters and to the country of his birth. On being asked in the name of American birth, he said "Nein, nein; I bees a Pennsylvania Dutchman." Another foreigner of the old sea-coast replied to one of the question as to his American birth-right, saying that he was born in Connecticut. A minister asserted that he was born in Connecticut, West Indies, in the Isle of Long Island. Several old married couples have found it impossible to agree upon the time they became man and wife, and were not able to furnish information about how many children they had, or how long they were alive, and how many who were dead, until after a good deal of reckoning. A woman in New Hampshire gave a most serious enumerator her age as thirty years, and insisted upon the truth of her statement when the officer expressed surprise. Soon after, the age of her youngest son was asked for, and stated to be twenty-six, which solved the riddle and explained the mystery. How-ever, she might have been only a step-mother!

A church session has arisen in Paris. An Engish family took a desire to worship in the Russian church in that city visited it, accompanied by a Russian lady. The pew opener, not learning that they were Protestants, invited them out with such violence that the latter of the party nearly talented. The Russian pope attached to the embassy attempted to explain the outrage by stating that he has not sufficient funds at his disposal to keep more than one pew opener. Otherwise the family in question would have been refused admittance at the door. The church is kept up for the solely the curiosity of foreigners, but to provide for the spiritual wants of Russians. This explanation does not seem to have been very well received.

Every Monday morning the city newspapers chronicle a terrible list of fights, outrages, and murders, which seem to have occurred during the quiet hours of Sunday. The desperate affrays which our holy days and quietly the occasion for, are partly in consequence of a loose administration of the Excise Law, which prostitutes the selling or giving away intoxicating liquors on Sunday and after twelve o'clock Saturday night. Another evidence is done Sunday than on any other day in the week.

A new fish story. A coddish lately caught on Portsmouth Harbor was found to contain a pint Champagne bottle in an entire state. A portion of the contents of the fish were growing about two and a half inches in length, and the fish was in a condition respecting this curiosity have been advanced. The old fishermen of the Piscataqua and the fish must have taken the bottle from the bar at the mouth of the Merrimac.

The French Secretary of the Interior has communicated to the Academy of Science, in Paris, an interesting report concerning all the cases of hydrophobia which were brought to the knowledge of his employes during the year 1869, on the departments of France. In which statistics were obtained, three hundred and twenty persons were bitten by mad dogs. In one hundred and twenty-nine cases the biting was followed by hydrophobia, and one hundred and twenty-three cases the bitten persons suffered no evil consequence, and it was never made known what became of the remaining eighty-eight. Of all the remedies employed after a person was bitten by a mad dog, the burning of the wound proved the most efficacious, and one hundred and thirty-four persons whose wounds were burnt suffered no evil consequences without evil consequences. The sucking of the wounds, or their treatment with ammonia (muriate of) did not appear were bitten, proved salutary also in many cases; but cauterization was far the safest means of all. In every case, without any exception where hydrophobia broke out, the patients died. The number of mad dogs was very nearly equally divided through the four seasons.

The Journal of Chemistry asserts that of sixteen popular hair tonics, washes, and restoratives recently examined, only one was free from lead. They owe their action to this substance, and consequently are highly dangerous to the health of persons using them. Substitutes for all the remedies contain combinations of time, oxide of zinc, or carbonate of lead suspended in water. The first two classes of cosmetic are as harmless as any other white dirt when plastered over the skin to close the pores and prevent the healthy action. On the other hand, the cosmetic composed of carbonate of lead are highly dangerous, and their use is very certain to produce disastrous results to those who patronize them.

The returns of the New York Custom-house during the past year for the importations of horses and cattle bair are much less than usual. We are sorry to say this is not because women are becoming more sensible, but is largely due to the immense amount of Indian jute which is sold instead of hair. This jute is very much cheap; but it is not unfrequently imperfectly cleansed, and will cause terrible diseases of the skin.

Various expedients may be adopted to preserve cut flowers a long while. Pure water, with a little salt or saltpetre in it, is recommended, and the water should be changed every day. A little camphor, charcoal, or liquid ammonia will often revive flowers that have begun to fade. Charcoal saturated with water is a good medium in which to place the stems of flowers.

Judging from observation, if we had a city ordinance requiring all the milk cows in Russia, our streets would be immaculately clean. If persons in Russia are found drunk and incapable before public thoroughfares they are taken into custody, and condemned to work for a day at sweeping the streets; and well-dressed citizens are sometimes seen performing their task, lowas in hand.

A certain missionary report states that "there are two kinds of missionaries, one with tawny-hued caudals," and calls for a "larger supply!" Is any body ready to answer?

The will of Charles Dickens is autographic. Having had his wishes put into legal form by his advisers, he copied the whole out with his own hand. The codicil to the same document is in all the law Record upon his eldest son, acting editor, and which is dated only seven days before his death, practically executes the periodical being conducted on the same principles and with the same spirit as heretofore.

A Saturday afternoon concert has been inaugurated in Prospect Park, Brooklyn, which has proved so much a success that it is believed it will become a permanent institution.

The Fourth of July having passed, it is rather late to bring up the matter, but really what is the use of making a speech on such a day? Who remembers it? and who listens when he remembers? Some serious accidents have occurred on the Fourth, but that will also be thought was easily, had her cheek severely injured.

A vagrant, recently arrested, protested that he had a regular trade—namely, smoking glasses for total eclipses of the sun.

"Time is rapidly approaching when railroad trains will fly with lightning speed from one end of our country to the other without even stopping," was a fellow-traveler the way. A novel method of supplying locomotive power is now on trial in Paris, and at one time in Pa—and, is about to be introduced into our country. The Hudson River Railroad Company have already made many satisfactory experiments. The station, near Rockleth, there was constructed in the centre of the track a trough, 1,640 feet in length, fifteen inches in depth, and eighteen inches wide. This was filled with salt water, nearly saturated. The train is perfectly straight, will hold 18,000 gallons of water, and is led by a series of syringes. A scoop has also been fitted up with an ingeniously constructed pipe, connecting with the tender, and as the train moves rapidly the water is conveyed dropped into the water, while the train is running thirty miles an hour. When the above experiment was made the water rose in a pail near into the tender, filling it to the complete satisfaction of the conductor.

An amazing little incident occurred during the registration of votes in Petersburg, Virginia, not long since. An aged colored man came to the place upon the occasion, and apparently with great difficulty. The prescribed formula, "How old are you?" was asked, when the old man was thrown much perplexity. Recovering himself, however, he muttered in an undertone, which was overheard:

"Well, how old is my ole mess?"

To be honest the old man's gentleman was standing by, well acquainted with him, who promptly answered:

"Your old master is dead a few years of age."

"Well, how ole is ole mister?"

"She is about forty-five years old."

"An' Mine baby?"

"Thirty-five, perhaps, next fall."

"An' my wife?"

"Nineteen this coming August."

"Well, I be dam'd after all got together, for I knows when dey all was born."

While the inspector on a train bound east from Kansas City was looking over the tickets, Mr. Jones, Utica, Missouri, he discovered a boy under one of the cars, who had concealed himself there all the way from Kansas City. He had formed a sort of net of rope, in which he lay suspended like a spider in its web, between the axle of the forward truck and the floor of the car. The boy was rested out of his place, and quite a crowd gathered around him on the platform. He was disposed to be saucy, and stated that he and riden in that way for hundreds of miles. As the train was moving off slowly from Jefferson city the boy got in his old place again and rode as far as Sedalia, when the conductor was notified, and stopped the train. The boy was hauled out by the inspector, and taken to the station, was in the act of hurling it at the conductor, when the latter knocked him down.

What a burning satisfaction some people take this warm weather in sweating, suffering, fainting, and boasting that it has gone up a little higher than their neighbors'! A Chicago man fixed a box and thermometer so as to be a little hotter, fan themselves more, and complain louder. He then exhibited his results and their complaints. It only made the mercury will warrant it. The truth is that half the world—the lazy half, we mean—would not feel the heat so much if, when the thermometer ranges among the nineties, they should, by some magic, set it to be only among the seventies. Imagination has a wonderfully healing or cooling influence!

The Board of Directors at the Ecole de Medicine, Paris, have conferred a diploma upon Miss Elizabeth Garrett. To her by them she related to have received "brilliantly that she obtained this honor.

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-FOURTH.

THE MANUSCRIPT.

1.

"My Confession: To be put into my coffin; and to be buried with me when I die.

"This is the history of what I did in the time of my married life. It is written with no other mortal creature, confessed to my Creator alone—in the truth.

"At the great day of the Resurrection, we shall all rise again in our bodies as we have lived. When I am called before the Judgment Seat I shall have this in my hand.

"Oh, just and merciful Judge, Thou knowest what I have suffered. My trust is in Thee!

"I am the eldest of a large family, born of pious parents. We belonged to the congregation of the Primitive Methodists.

"My sisters were all married before me. I remained for some years the only one at home. At the latter part of the time my mother's health failed; and I managed the house in her place. Our spiritual pastor, good Mr. Bapchild, used often to dine with us on Sundays, between the services. He approved of my management of the house, and, in particular, of my cooking. This was not pleasant to my mother, who is no less jealous of my being, as it were, set over her in her place. My unhappiness in this respect is in this way. My mother's temper got worse as her health got worse. My father was much away from us, traveling for his business. I had to bear it all. About this time I began to think it would be well for me if I could get married to my sisters had done; and have good Mr. Bapchild to dinner, between the services, in a house of my own.

"In this frame of mind I made acquaintance with a young man who attended service at our chapel.

"His name was Joel Dethridge. He had a beautiful voice, and when we sang hymns, I used to off the same book with me. By trade he was a paper-hanger. We had much conversation to-gether. I walked with him on Sundays. He was a good ten years younger than I was; and, being only a journeyman, his wealth was much be-low mine. My mother found out the liking that had grown up between us, and forbade my father the next time he was at home. Also my married sisters and my brothers. They all join-ed together to treat me with contempt. I was ill-treated me and Joel Dethridge. I had a bad time of it. Mr. Bapchild expressed himself as feeling much grieved at the turn matters were taking. He introduced me into a sermon—not by name, but I knew who it was I was meant for. Perhaps I might have given way if they had not done one thing. They made inquiries of my young man's enemies, and brought to me the stories of him to me behind his back. This, after we had sung off the same hymn-book, and walk-ed together, and agreed one with the other on religious subjects, was too much to bear. I was of age to judge for myself. And I married Joel Dethridge.

"My relations all turned their backs on me. Not one of them was present at my marriage. My brother Reuben, in particular, when he met me first, saying that they had done with me from that time forth. Mr. Bapchild was much grieved; he shed tears, and said he would pray for me.

4.

"I was married in London by a pastor who was a stranger; and we settled in London with a fair prospect. I had a little fortune, and my own —my share of some money left to us girls by our aunt Hannah, who was named after. It was three hundred pounds. Nearly one hundred of this I spent in buying furniture to fit up the little house we took to live in. The rest I gave to my husband to put into the bank against the time when he wanted it to set up in business for himself.

"For three months, more or less, we got on nicely—especially in one particular. My husband never stirred in the matter of starting in business for himself.

"He was once or twice cross with me when I said it seemed a pity to be spending the money in the bank which might be otherwise employed, instead of earning more in business. Good Mr. Bapchild, happening about this time to be in London, said over Sunday, and came to dine with us between the services. He had tried to make my husband my relations' agent, but had not succeeded. At my request he spoke to my husband about the necessity of exerting himself. My husband took it ill. I then was very unhappy by out of temper for the first time. Good Mr. Bapchild also spoke. He appeared to be less alarmed at what had happened; and he took his leave early.

"Shortly afterward my husband went out. I got tea ready for him—but he never came back. I got supper ready for him—but he never came back. It was past twelve at night be-fore I saw him again. I was very much startled by the state he came home in. He didn't speak like himself, or look like himself; he didn't seem to know me—walked in his mind, and fell all in a lump like on our bed. I ran out an' fetch-ed the doctor to him.

"The doctor pulled him up to the light, and looked at him; smelled his breath, and dropped him down again on the bed; turned about, and stared at me. 'What's the matter, Sir?' I says.

"Do you mean to tell me you don't know?' says the doctor. 'No, Sir,' says I. 'Why start out of a woman are you,' says he, 'not to know a drunken man when you see him!' With that he went away, and left me standing over the bed-side, all in a tremble from head to foot.

"This was the first I found out that I was the wife of a drunken man.

"I have omitted to say any thing about my husband's family.

"While we were keeping company together he told me he was an orphan—with an uncle and aunt in Canada, and an only brother settled in Scotland. Before we were married, I wrote me a letter from this brother. It was to say that he was coming to London to see his brother married, and be present at my marriage, and to wish me joy and the rest of it. Good Mr. Bapchild (to whom my husband had never wrote privately of what had happened) wrote back in return, telling me to wait a little, and see whether this brother came or not.

"I had not long to wait. He was in liquor again when he came to see me. After this, Mr. Bapchild instructed me to send him the let-ter from my husband's brother. He reminded me of some of the stories about my husband, which I had refused to believe in the time before I was married; and he said it might be well to make inquiries.

"The end of the inquiries was this. The brother (who came to my husband privately (by his own request) under a doctor's care to be broke of habits of intemperance. He was using for strong liquor (the doctor was to me) in the family. They would be sober sometimes for months together. Then they would begin drinking rate. Then the fit would seize them; and they would drink, drink, drink, like sponges—like fish, the mad and miserable wretches that they were.

"This was the husband I was married to. And I had omitted all up to this time to have warned them from me, for his sake. Here was surely the duty of a husband to a woman after only a few months of wedded life!

"In a year's time the money in the bank was gone; and my husband was out of employment. He always got work—being a first-rate hand when he was sober—and always lost it again when the drinking-fit came on. I had to leave our nice little house, and part with my furniture piece by piece, and go into lodgings. I thought this a mercy instead of a misfortune. In my situation (as I soon grew to know) my husband was getting a shilling a week more than he as aggravation of my hard lot.

"The state of employment I wanted was not to be got in a day. Good Mr. Bapchild gave me a character; and our landlord, a worthy man, belonging, I am sorry to say, to the Popish Church, spoke for me to the steward of a club. Still, it took many months to provide that I was the thorough good cook I claimed to be. Nigh on a fortnight had passed before I got the chance I had been looking out for. I was hired to be good spirits (for me) to report what had happened, and found the houses in the house carrying off the furniture which I had begun with my own money for sale by auction. I asked the landlord to search it over, and see to the fit. They answered, civilly enough I must own, that they were answerable for my husband's orders; and they went on removing. I had my own eyes, to the cart outside. I ran up stairs, and found my husband on the bed-room floor, in his liquor again. It is useless to say what passed between us. I shall only mention that this was the first occasion on which he lifted his fist, and struck me.

"Having a spirit of my own, I was resolved not to endure it. I ran out to the Police Court, hard by.

"My money had not only bought the furniture —it had kept the house in order, and was the tax-es which the Queen and the Parliament take from us women the many things. I now went to the magistrate to complain to the Queen and the Parliament, in return for the taxes, would do for me.

"Is your furniture settled on yourself?' he says, when I told him what had happened.

"I didn't understand him, and told him. He turned to some person who was sitting on the bench with him. 'This is a hard case,' he says. 'Poor people in this condition of life don't even know what a marriage settlement means. And, if they did know it, the money is already gone by the lawyer's charges?' Upon that he turn-ed to me. 'Yours is a hard case,' he said. 'In the present state of the law I can do nothing for you.'

"It was impossible to believe that. Common or not, I put my case to him over again.

"'I have bought the furniture with my own money, Sir,' I says. 'It's mine, honestly come by, with all and receipt to prove it. They are taking it away from me by force, to sell it against my will. Don't tell me that's the law. This is a Christian country. It can't be.'

"My good creature,' says he, 'you are a married woman. The law doesn't allow a married woman to call any thing her own—unless she has previously (with a lawyer's help) made a bargain to that effect with her husband before marrying him. You have made no bargain. Your husband has a right to sell your furniture if he likes. I am sorry for you; I can't hinder him.'

"I was obstinate about it. 'Please to answer me this, Sir,' I says. 'I've been told by wiser heads than mine that we all pay our taxes to keep the soldiers and the Parliament going; and that the Queen and the Parliament make laws to protect us in return. I have paid my taxes. Why, if you please, is there no law to protect me in return?'

"I can't enter into that,' says he. 'I must take the law as I find it; and so must you. I see a man here on the side of your face. Has your husband been striking you?' If he has, summon him here. I can punish him for that.'

"How can I punish him, Sir?' says I.

"'I can fine him,' says he. 'Or I can send him to prison.'

"'As to the fine,' says I, 'he can pay that out of the money he gets by selling my furniture. As to the prison, while he's in it, what's to become of me, with my money spent by him, and my possessions gone; and when he's out of it, what's to become of me again, with a husband whom I have been the means of punishing, and who comes home to his wife knowing it? It's bad enough as it is, Sir,' says I. 'There's more that's bruised in me than what shows in my face. I will you good morning, Sir.'

6.

"When I got back the furniture was gone, and my husband was gone. There was nobody but the landlord in the empty house. He said that my husband had—kindly enough I must me, so far as I was concerned. When he was sober, he cheated my rank, and got away in a cab after dark, and found a lodging to stay in by the night. If ever there was a lonely, broken-hearted creature in the world, I was that creature that night.

"There was but one chance of earning my bread—to go to the employment offered me (under a man cook, at a club). And there was but one hope that I had lost sight of my husband forever.

"I went to my work—and prospered in it—and saved my master's wages. But it's not good for a woman to be situated as I was; considering that she is out of many things that shock a pride in sold away from her, and with nothing to look forward to in her life to come. I was only a woman at cheap; but I think my beast began to get hardened, and my heart to be set upon nothing but with its own thoughts about this time. There was a change coming. Two or three days after I had earned my wages, I was informed that my husband was dead. The furniture-money was all spent. He died in the hospital, at the club. I was only able to quiet him by giving him all the money I could spare from my own necessities. The inquest on the body found the cause natural. The spirit, if the circumstance occurred again, they should be obliged to part with me. In a fortnight the circumstance occurred again. It's useless to dwell on it. They all said they were sorry for me. They were all kind to me. I went back with me to my lodgings. The next morning I caught him taking my purse, with the few shillings I had left in it, out of my trunk, which he had broken open. We quarreled. And he struck me again. I left the house, leaving me down.

"I went once more to the police court, and told my story—to another magistrate this time. My husband came to have my husband kept away from me. 'I don't want to be a burden to my husband,' I says; 'I only want to do any thing but what's right. I don t even complain of having been very cruelly used. All I ask is to be kept away from him.' Will the law protect me in the effort to do this?'

"In the matter of divorce, was the law that might protect me, provided I had money to spend in asking some higher court to grant me a separation. But the law would not interfere to help me openly of the only property I possessed—my body, my character—the law turned round on me when I called upon it in my distress, and held out its hand to be paid. I had just three and sixpence left in the world. Will the law protect me in the effort to do this?'

"In the matter of divorce, was the law that might protect me, provided I had money to spend in asking some higher court to grant me a separation. But the law would not interfere to help me openly of the only property I possessed—my body, my character—the law turned round on me when I called upon it in my distress, and held out its hand to be paid. I had just three and sixpence left in the world. Will the law protect me in the effort to do this?'

"I went to my husband's brother, and asked him to lend me a shilling. I thought of Mr. Bapchild (see the book of Judges; chapter 4th; verses 17 to 21). I thought of Jael, and a nail of the tent, and took a hammer in her hand, and went softly unto him, and smote the nail into his temples, and fastened it into the ground, for he was fast asleep and weary. So he died.' She did this deed to deliver the people from fetters. If there had been a hammer and a nail in the room where I was, I think I should have been Jael—with this difference, that I should have done it to deliver myself.

"With the morning this passed off, for the time. I went and spoke to a lawyer.

"Most people, in my place, would have had enough of the law already. But I was one of the sort who drain the cup to the dregs. What I said to him was, in substance, this. 'I come to ask your advice as a madman. Most people, as I understand it, are people who have lost the control over their minds. Sometimes this leads them to entertaining delusions; and sometimes it leads them to committing actions hurtful to others or to themselves. My husband has lost all control over his own craving for strong drink. I myself have lost the control over the other madness require to be kept from attempting their own lives, or the lives of those about them. Legally, I have proved the madness with him—just as it's a frenzy beyond their own control, with me. There are a hundred other people, all over the country, of the public disposal, on certain conditions. If I fulfill those conditions, will you have deliver me from the misery of being married to a madman, whose madness is drink?'—'No,' says the lawyer. 'The law of England declines to consider an incurable drunkard as a fit object for restraint; the law of England leaves the husbands and wives of such people in a perfectly helpless situation, to deal with them as they may choose or may best can.'

"I made my acknowledgments to the gentleman and left him. The last chance was this chance—and this had failed me.

little money I had, to let me be. My good master spoke to him. It was all useless. He was obstinate and savage. If—instead of my running off from him—he had been all the other way, and he had run off from me, something might have been done (as I understood) to protect me. But he stuck to his wife. As long as I could make a farthing, he stuck to his wife. Being married to him, I had no right to have left him; I was bound to go with my husband: there was no escape for me. I bade them good-by. And I have never forgotten their kindness to me from that day to this.

"My husband took me back to London.

"As long as the money lasted, the drinking went on. When it was gone, I was beaten again. Where was the remedy? There was no remedy, but to try and escape him once more. Why didn't I have him locked up? What was the good of locking him locked up? After a few weeks he would be out of prison; sober and penitent, and promising amendment—and then when the fit took him, there he would be, the same furious savage that he had been often and often before. Where, I say, was the good, the hopelessness of it; and dark thoughts beset me, mostly at night. About this time I began to say to myself, 'There's no deliverance from this, but in death—his death or mine.

"Once or twice I went down to the bridges after dark, and looked over at the river. No. I wasn't the only one of women who took her own wretchedness in that way. Your blood must be in a fever, and your head in a flame—at least I found so—you must be hurried into it, like, to go and make away with yourself. My troubles never took that effect on me. I always turned cold under them, instead of hot. Bad for me, I dare say: but what you are—you are. Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots?

"I got away from him once more, and found good employment once more. It don't matter now; and it don't matter where. My story is always the same thing, over and over again. There was one change, however, this time. My employment was not in a private family. I was allowed to teach cookery to a teenage women, in my leisure hours. What with this, and what with the longer time passing on the present occasion before my husband found me out, I was as comfortably off as in my position I could hope to be. When my work was done, I went away at night to sleep in a lodging of my own. It was only a single room. But I thought it—in self—partly for the sake of economy (the rent being not half as much as for a furnished room); partly from the habit of cheapness. Through all my troubles I always liked things neat about me—neat and shapely and good.

"Well, it's needless to say how it ended. He found me out again—this time by a chance-meeting in the street.

"He was in rags, and half starved. But that didn't matter. I took him home, and to do was to put his hand into my pocket and take what he wanted. There is no limit, in England, to what a husband may take from home so long as he is his wife. On the present occasion, he was cunning enough to see that it would be the loser if he disturbed me in my employments. I was while things went on as smoothly as could be expected. I remember that the work was done more usual; and I got leave (loathing the sight of him, I honestly own) to sleep at the place where I was employed. This was not for long. The fit took him again, in due course; and he came home one night with a nail of the tent, and took a hammer in her hand, and went softly unto him, and smote the nail into his temples, and fastened it into the ground, for he was fast asleep and weary. So he died.' She did this deed to deliver the people from fetters. If there had been a hammer and a nail in the room where I was, I think I should have been Jael—with this difference, that I should have done it to deliver myself.

"With the morning this passed off, for the time. I went and spoke to a lawyer.

"Most people, in my place, would have had enough of the law already. But I was one of the sort who drain the cup to the dregs. What I said to him was, in substance, this. "I made my acknowledgments to the gentleman and left him. The last chance was this chance—and this had failed me.

"The thought that had once found its way into my mind already, now found its way back again: and never altogether left me from that time forth. No deliverance for me but in death —in death, or madness.

"I had it before me night and day; in chapel and out of chapel just the same. I read the story of Joel and Sisera so often that the Bible got to open of itself at that place.

"The cry of my country, which ought to have protected me as an honest woman, left me helpless. In place of the laws I had no friend near to open my heart to. I was shut up in myself. And I was married to that man. Consider me as a human creature, and say, Was this not trying my humanity very hardly?

"I wrote to good Mr. Bapchild. Not going into particulars; only telling him I was beset by temptation, and begging him to come and help me. He was confined to his bed by illness, but he could only write me a letter of good advice. To profit by good advice people must have a glimpse of happiness to look forward to as the reward for exerting themselves. Religion itself is obliged to hold out a reward, and to say to our poor nature, Be good, and you shall go to Heaven. I had no glimpse of happiness. I was thankful (in a dull sort of way) to good Mr. Bapchild when I had ended.

"The time had been when a word from my old pastor would have put me in the right way again. I began to feel scared by myself. If the next ill usage I received from that brute Sharp found me an unchanged woman, it was borne in strongly on my mind that I should run off the rails as not to get my deliverance from him by my own hand.

"Goaded to it, by the fear of this, I humbled myself before my relations for the first time. One of my sisters was married to a parson. I had wrote to beg their pardon; to say that I was sorry I proved to be what in their opinion of my husband; and to entreat them to be friends with me again, so far as to let me visit them from time to time. My notion was, that it might soften my heart if I could see the old place, and talk the old talk, and look again at the well-remembered faces. I am almost ashamed to own it—but if I had had any hope in God, I should have acted with it all, to be allowed to go back into mother's kitchen and cook the Sunday dinner for them once more.

"But this was not to be. Not long before my letter was received mother had died. They had it all at my door. She had been ailing for years past, and the doctors had said it was hopeless from the first—but they had to tell me at the door. One of my sisters wrote to my that much, in as few words as possible, considering the way to ring it. My father never answered my letter at all.

"Magistrates and lawyers; relations and friends; endurance of injuries, reproaches, hope and homesickness—I had tried all these, and tried them vainly. Look round me where I might, the prospect was closed on all sides.

"At this time my husband had got a little work to do. He came home out of employment one night, and I gave him a warning. 'Don't try me too far, Joel, for your own sake,' was all I said. It was not of his sober days I was afraid, for the first time, a word from me seemed to have an effect on him. He looked hard at me (or as much so as his eyes would be worst and sat down in a corner, and held his peace.

"This was on a Tuesday in the week. On the Saturday he got paid, and the drinking for took him again.

"On Friday in the next week I happened to come back late—having had a good stroke of work to do that day, in the way of cooking a public dinner for a tavern-keeper who knew me. I found my husband gone, and the bedroom stripped of the furniture which I had put into it, and found him. The landlady came out into the passage and tried to stop me. She was a bigger and a stronger woman than I was. But I shook her off like a child. Thinking over it now, I believe she was in no condition to put out her strength. The sight of me frightened her.

"I found him. I said—well, I said what a woman beside herself with fury would be likely to say. It's needless to tell how it ended. He knocked me down.

"After that, there is a spot of darkness like in my memory. The next thing I can call to mind, coming back to my senses after some days. Three of my teeth were knocked out—but that was not the worst of it. He had had struck against something in falling, and some part of me (a nerve, I think they said) was injured in such a way as to affect my speech. I don't mean that I was downright dumb—I only mean that, all of a sudden, it had become a labor to me to speak. A long word was as serious an obstacle as if I was a child again. Names and places came to the head. When the medical gentlemen heard what it was, the medical gentlemen came crowding round me. I appeared to lay hold of their interest, just as a story-book lays hold of the interest of other people. The upshot of it was, that I might end in being dumb, or I might get my speech again—the chances were about equal. Only two things were needful. One of them was that I should live on good nourishing diet. The other was, that I should keep my mind easy.

"About the diet it was not possible to decide. My getting good nourishing food and drink depended on my getting money to buy the same. As to my mind, there was no difficulty about that. If my husband came back to me, my mind was made up to kill him.

"Horrid—I am well aware this is horrid. Nobody else, in my place, would have ended as wicked as this. All the other women in the world who tried as I was, would have risen superior to the trial.

"I have said that people (excepting my husband and my relations) were forbidden to help me. wanted in them. So I had a roof to cover me, and a choice of beds to lie on, and money to get food. All well enough, as it would seem. But that house could speak, what tales that house would have to tell of me!

"I had been told by the doctors to exercise my speech. Being all alone, with nobody to talk to, except when the landlady dropped in, or when the servant next door said, 'Nice day, isn't it?' or, 'I think you had better put on your flannel petticoat,' I read to myself. I read like a child learning to read. I read for the sake of the words. I read the sentences over and over again, to hear how they sounded. I read the stories of murders and robberies, and of wives of drunken husbands. It was a report of something said on that subject by a London magistrate, who had held inquests on dead husbands (in the lower ranks of life), and who had his sentences respecting the wives. 'Considering all of the body (he said) didn't prove it; and witnesses didn't prove it; but he himself knew sometimes didn't prove it; but he himself knew sometimes there could be no other cause, than, when the woman could bear it no longer, she sometimes took a knife herself, and waited till her husband (drugged with his own liquor) was sunk in his sleep, and then put the towel over his throat and mouth, and cut that way without any body being the wiser. I had down the newspaper, and fell into thinking. My mind was, by this time, in a prophetic way. I said to myself, 'I haven't happened on this for nothing: this means that I shall see the end of him.'

"It was then just after my dinner-time—two o'clock, I should have said, in the afternoon when I had put out my candle, and laid me down in bed, I heard a knock at the street door. Before I had let you know, I ought to tell you, I had got a room to myself.

"I huddled on a few things, and struck a light, and went down. My landlord came through the door, 'Who's there?' And his voice answered, 'Let me in.'

"I sat down on a chair in the passage, and shook all over like a person struck with palsy. Not from the fear of him—but from the fear of acting in the prophetic way. I knew I was going to be driven to it at last. Try as I might to keep it away, I knew I should do it. I was to do it now. I sat shaking on the chair in the passage: I on one side of the door, and he on the other.

"He knocked again, and again, and again. I knew it was not how this was done, and I meant to try. I determined not to let him in till it was forced to it. I determined to keep him waiting as a slight before, and to see if the neighborhood would stop between us. I went up stairs and sat out the open staircase window on the landing.

"The policeman came up, and the neighbors came out. They were all for giving him into custody. The policeman laid hands on him. He had but one word to say; he had only to point up to me at the window, and tell the truth. It was his wife. The neighbors went indoors again. The policeman dropped hold of him and left. It was I who was in the wrong. And not he. I was bound to let my husband in. I went down stairs again, and let him in.

"Nothing passed between us that night. I threw open the door of the bedroom next to mine, and made him lay himself down on my own room. He was dead beat with roaming the streets, without a penny in his pocket, for a day and night. The bed to lie on was all he wanted for that night.

"The next morning I tried again—tried to turn back on the way that I was doomed to go: knowing beforehand that it would be of no use. I offered him three parts of my poor weekly earnings, to be paid to him regularly at the landlord's hand, if he would only keep away from me, and from the house. He laughed in my face. As if my husband, he could take what he pleased! As if he had not as far leaving the house, the house offered him free quarters to live in as long as I could afford to look after it! As if I couldn't starve and he couldn't starve, and my wife!

"I said no more. I left in the day the landlord cause. Each Corps and Union has its own lord cause. Each Corps and Union has its own lord cause. Each Corps and Union has its own l

MR. DICKENS'S HOUSE AT GADSHILL.

MR. DICKENS'S HOUSE AT GADSHILL.

GADSHILL is doubly illustrious in English literature — first, as the scene of one of SHAKSPEARE'S most celebrated pieces of humor, and, secondly, as the residence of the greatest and most universal humorist who has lived since SHAKSPEARE'S time. Even as a child Mr. DICKENS nourished an ambitious fancy for becoming the owner of the house at Gadshill. His father had told him that if he worked hard and minded his book he might one day live in such a house, and the speech sank deep into the child's heart. Years after, when Mr. DICKENS was contemplating a removal from the city to the country, his intimate friend Mr. W. H. WILLS chanced to meet a lady at dinner who had recently inherited a house and grounds of which she was anxious to dispose. The house was in Kent; it had various features resembling Gadshill, which made Mr. WILLS listen with increasing interest, till presently he found that it was the very place of Mr. DICKENS's boyish dreams. So Mr. DICKENS became the possessor of Gadshill.

On page 461 we give an engraving of this interesting property. It is to be sold, together with the valuable collection of pictures gathered by its illustrious owner.

CONSTANTINOPLE FIREMEN.

A GLANCE at the second illustration on page 461 will help to explain the ravages of the recent fire in Constantinople, in which seven thousand houses were destroyed, and above two thousand lives were lost. The fire brigade of the Ottoman capital consists of a horde of half-naked, undisciplined savages, armed with clumsy little hand fire-engines, about as effective as pocket-squirting-pots to check a serious conflagration. Fires are never put out in Constantinople. A building that once takes fire is doomed, as nothing but want of material checks the flames.

VISITING IN CHINA.

A VISIT of ceremony is conducted with great politeness. Your card must be sent in before you by a special herald—a "ting-chai" (the Chinese use well up in the fashion of which, when they have long practiced)—who should be dispatched in good time to allow of proper preparation by those who are to receive you. Your rank being stated on your card, you are received according as it by the gentleman or servants you call. If he comes out a certain distance, in proportion to your rank; he bows and you bow, while such says "Chin chin," and you are invited in; but at every doorway he pauses and politely proposes you should precede him, which you decline as politely; and at last, after many protestations, he goes first, with some pretty apology. The room is entered, and each is seated, attendants enter with cups of tea and sweetmeats, and the customary conversation then passes, beginning with "Qua shing?"—"What is your honorable name?" and fifty questions which in no less half rude and almost insulting; but this curiosity toward an honorable acquaintance is not considered at all unbecoming, it would be a mark of gentleman's eyes very rude not to make all these inquiries. The exhibits half hour have passed, and the business (if any) to be transacted being over, the guest is conducted away toward the door with the same ceremony with which he came, a ting-chai is in waiting with cups of tea and sweetmeats, and the customary conversation then passed, beginning with "Qua shing?"—"What is your honorable name?"—"What is your honorable age

A REPOSITORY OF

FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most rapid and unprecedented. Its success is the result of journalism, and is recognized as such by the intelligent and refined family circles to which it goes. It is an illustrated chronicler of Fashion it is without a rival in this country. By a special arrangement, involving great expense, with the publishers of the Berlin Bazar—the leading journal of fashion in Europe—its fashion-plates are published in New York simultaneously with their appearance in Berlin and Europe.

A large portion of the BAZAR is every week devoted to instructive and entertaining reading-matter—Stories, Poems, Biographical Sketches, and Gossip. The fashion-plates are always elegant, and cover every branch of dress; and the numerous wood-cut engravings will be spared to no reasonable exertion to secure the victory which it has won so rapidly, and which it so well deserves.

Our readers will find some of the beautiful costumes in HARPER'S BAZAR, outside the regular Supplement, graded to suit any figure from 10 to 40 inches measure, with the names and directions for putting together printed on each separate piece. The patterns will be sent by the Publishers prepaid by mail on receipt of Fifteen Cents for each pattern. Sometimes the same patterns cost sixty cents in good in Paris. Dressmakers will find them the cutter and fitter of $2 00. Newsdealers supplied at the usual discount. In order to secure the regular delivery of Bazar copies, subscribe at the nearest post-office.

In the BAZAR for April 16 was commenced "The Double Cloth," a serial story of thrilling interest by the Author of "Cord and Creese," "The Dodge Club," &c., profusely illustrated.

CARBOLIC SALVE.

The important discovery of the CARBOLIC ACID as a CLEANSING, PURIFYING, and HEALING Agent is one of the most remarkable results of modern medical research. During the past year it was extensively used in the Hospitals, and was found to be not only a thorough disinfectant, but also the most wonderful and speedy HEALING REMEDY ever known.

It is now presented in a scientific combination with other soothing and healing agencies, in the form of a SALVE; and, having been already used in numberless cases with most satisfactory and beneficial results, we have no hesitation in offering it to the public as the most certain, rapid, and effectual remedy for all Sores and Ulcers, no matter of how long standing, for Burns, Cuts, Wounds, and every ABRASION of SKIN or FLESH, and for Skin diseases generally.

THE GRAVE OF CHARLES DICKENS.

In the extremity of the south transept of the venerable Abbey Church of St. Peter, at Westminster, is a place allotted by traditional custom to the burial or obituary record of men whose literary genius has adorned the English nation. For many ages this has been called "Poets' Corner." Here is the tomb of GEOFFREY CHAUCER, "the Father of English Poetry," who was also a man of official business, Clerk of the Works in the precincts of the King's palace at Westminster, including the Abbey. He died in October, 1400, at his house close by, which stood on the site of HENRY VII.'s Chapel. The first English printer, CAXTON, who set up his types and worked his press in a chapel of the Abbey, caused a simple tablet, with a couplet of Latin verse written by a scholar of Milan, to be placed above his friend CHAUCER'S grave. A century and a half later, in 1556, Mr. NICHOLAS BRIGHAM, "in the name of the Muses," erected the well-known monument of gray marble, with a full-length statue of CHAUCER, copying the head, the costume, and the attitude from OCCLEVE'S contemporary portrait. That was the beginning of Poets' Corner.

In this sacred precinct, within a few steps of old CHAUCER'S grave, lie the remains of CHARLES DICKENS. The engraving underneath shows the position of the grave in respect to the well-known cenotaph of SHAKSPEARE, which stands against the wall, with the monuments of NICHOLAS ROWE, JAMES THOMSON, MATTHEW PRIOR, SOUTHEY, and THOMAS CAMPBELL; these confronting those of ADDISON, MACKENZIE, and HANDEL, and the bust of THACKERAY. Nearly opposite the grave of DICKENS is that of Lord MACAULAY.

In accordance with the following explicit directions in his will, no costly monument will be erected to his memory: "I direct that my name be inscribed in plain English letters on my tomb. ..... I enjoin my friends on no account to make me the subject of any monument, memorial, or testimonial whatever. I rest my claims to the remembrance of my country upon my published works, and the remembrance of my friends upon their experience of me in addition thereto."

After his interment "Poets' Corner" was visited by thousands, many of whom brought flowers to lay upon his grave, which will henceforth be a sacred spot, with the New World as well as with the Old, as that of one of the greatest representatives of the literature not of England only, but of all who speak the English tongue.

a new Serial Story of great interest, founded on incidents of Prison Life in England, by the Author of "Cullyon's Year," "Off on the Fluffy," "A Struggle for Life," "Gwendoline's Harvest," and other popular Novels.

THE OLD STORY.

AT the late Commencement of Cornell University ex-Governor SEYMOUR delivered an address upon the character and institutions of New York as moulded by its founders, and its history as determined by its topography and geography. The orator stated and urged the claims of the Dutch element in our history. In Mr. SEYMOUR'S judgment, it is not from England, depressed by the long tyranny of the PLANTAGENETS, the TUDORS, and the STUARTS, but from republican Holland, that we derive our best ideas of constitutional and independent law and municipal freedom. To the Puritans, on the other hand, he thinks that we owe a certain vigor of character and opportune agitation and religion. It is the happy mingling of both elements that forms our character. Mr. SEYMOUR calls the principle of the Revolution, "no taxation without consent," a Dutch principle. But it would not be very difficult to show the ready assertion of the principle and that principle through all the tyranny of PLANTAGENETS, TUDORS, and STUARTS in England. It is not, indeed, from the English government by that tyranny, but from the England protesting against it, that American derives its impulse.

Mr. SEYMOUR devoted a considerable part of his address to the explanation of the theory and working of our system of self-government. It is a system which keeps at home the sense of political power, and which does not regard the central government as the source of authority. The center lowered the vital impulse and impeded authority, and asserted the doctrine of State rights. But in our system that is not the necessary assertion. Both reason and experience show that we need to cultivate a national rather than a local feeling. The ties that attach an intelligent people to their town or county or State are close and obvious. They are those of neighborhood, and of direct personal interest. Indeed, in the natural history of that attachment is the ground of peril to the common peace. The most powerful argument against the formation of the Union was the appeal to this jealousy of local authority; while the most convincing proof of the folly of pushing that local authority to extremity was seen in the impotence of the old Confederation. But justly measuring the relative tendencies of centralization and dispersion under a republican system among people in the condition of the colonies, HAMILTON said that, in the Union as formed, the centrifugal would be stronger than the centripetal force; and the event has proved that he was correct.

The absence of discord in this country has never been a centralising spirit, but the doctrine of State sovereignty. This disorganizing tendency began with the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions, which were, in essence, the declaration of an authority incompatible with that of national power, and which, logically, restored the Confederation. Still farther and later, the doctrine of State sovereignty was invoked to justify a fatal injury to the common welfare of all the States. Mr. SEYMOUR says that "under our institutions evils are at once exposed where intelligence and virtue have shown their in their true light to the communities in which they exist." But our history shows that the greatest of all evils was first fostered by the theory of State sovereignty into monstrous and appalling proportions. It was, in the same line, the attempt was made not to remove it, but to impose that evil permanently upon the whole country. And when it was opposed, the same theory of State sovereignty attempted the common ruin by disintegration.

The way, the enormous cost of life, and the immense debt are the consequences of the inculcation of the theory of State sovereignty until it became the serious belief of a part of the country that any State was at liberty to revoke its assent to the compact of union, and withdraw. This fatal delusion was greatly due to precisely the kind of statement that is found in Mr. SEYMOUR'S address. And Mr. SEYMOUR'S own hesitating, doubtful, reluctant position during the war was owing to the ascendency which such views had obtained over his mind. The greatest of evils in a free State menaced the Union. "Let the Union go," said Mr. SEYMOUR, in substance, "rather than abolish slavery by the national authority." And plainly, if the government had been administered by those who held the views that Mr. SEYMOUR holds of it, it would not have been maintained. The advice of the Chicago Convention, of which Mr. SEYMOUR was president, to yield to the rebellion, would have been adopted.

This indifference and hostility to the Union which resulted in the war were, we say, fostered by such lessons as those of Mr. SEYMOUR'S Ithaca address. "Instead of regarding the national authority," he says, speaking of the national government, "it only receives the remnant of power after all that concern local, county, and State jurisdiction have been distributed." By such teachings the feeling of jealousy and suspicion of the Union has been fostered. Indeed, so far as necessary in our system which is naturally much the stronger, and which needs no forcing, has been stimulated. It is certain that Mr. SEYMOUR would better have used the occasion if he had devoted his unquestionable historical attainments, and his reflective powers to showing to his young audience that the vital fault of every confederation has been its weakness; that this result is the obvious lesson; that therefore our fathers designed a Union and not a Confederacy; that the harmony of our Union was constantly disturbed and threatened by the undiscriminating assertion of local supremacy; and that this assertion culminated in the latest and disastrous rebellion to destroy the Union. He might then have shown that, with a wise distribution of political duties in our system, the power of the Union is the guarantee of every thing that is most truly republican in the subordinate forms; and that while an intelligent people will love and cherish and maintain their local authority, they should constantly cherish a noble patriotism which makes the glory of the nation the glory of citizen.

This, rather than the tone of distrust of the national government which pervades the teachings of the State sovereignty school in which Mr. SEYMOUR was educated, should be the political lesson of to-day in the United States.

CONGRESSIONAL COURTESY.

THE student of the Congressional debates can not help seeing that courtesy should be numbered legislation indulges in a great deal of captious personal criticism. The manners of Congress, indeed, are sometimes reminiscent of the days when the plantation ascendency. The passages between General BUTLER and General FARNSWORTH, or between any other honorable gentlemen, are very much more tolerable than those of the time of BARNBARE, PRESTON BROOKS, and HERBERT, of Kentucky. We may not expect now, as then, to see bowie-knives opening, revolvers glistening, and swigs flying when a debate grows warm; but it is very wise to imagine a Representative going into the Senate chamber and deliberately attempting the assassination of a Senator, as in the case which some Senators look calmly on. Therefore, disagreeable and mortifying as the Republican bickering in the Democratic party, strategy to perpetuate slavery, was dominant in Congress and the country. The fact that the loud laughably calls itself "conservative" which played the bully in Congress, as it did in the politics of the country.

As the principles of the Republican party are noble instead of ignoble, civilizing instead of barbarizing, it is a misfortune that it has not also the grace of bad manners to vanish from Congress with the party of slavery. But honorable gentlemen become so interested in the advocacy of favorite measures that they are sometimes overbearing, and do not spare the unhandsomest insinuations against their own party friends. Surely a man may differ with another as to the wisdom of a method of attaining a common object without flatly exposing himself to the charge of recreancy to the object. And it is certain that a taunt is the worst of arguments. If both sides in Mr. B. are both seeking a road to a pleasant inn in three fervent days of July, and Mr. A. says that he thinks the road to the left is the shortest, and Mr. B. says that the other road is the shortest, and Mr. A. thereupon retorts that it is because Mr. B. is lately deaf and can not hear, that is not at all what must we all say of Mr. A. but that he jumps to conclusions with ludicrous celerity? That being at least, is evident, and that is, that he does not wish to convince Mr. B.

We are very sure that honorable gentlemen in the heat of debate become so blinded, wholly forget what impression will be made upon the country by the little sneers and slurs which they so freely scatter. Even the most reverence respect for distinguished Representatives and Senators can not read without very unpleasant emotions that they exchange compliments and insinuations like angry boys at school. Self-command is a very beautiful and a very important virtue; and if one honorable gentleman forgets it, it is a great pity that other honorable gentlemen should immediately hasten to follow his example. Surely it is well to remember that the meanest possible motive that can be imagined for supporting a measure is not necessarily the reason that influences the action of honorable colleagues. It was precisely this spirit which accused SENATOR GRIMES, one of the honestest men in Congress, of being a Judas Iscariot and sold for thirty pieces, because he could not see that a certain charge had been proved. It was, indeed, conceivable that a Senator might be bribed; but to insinuate that a man of the best character was bribed, because he took a different view from his accuser, was simply brutal. The gentleman of the press sneered at the idea of Mr. FESSENDEN'S claiming to have a conscience. Nobody could be surprised at such a comment who didn't agree with that particular gentleman of the press.

The offenses against courtesy of which we are speaking are, we repeat, very different from the brutality and barbarism of conduct which characterized the days of Democratic ascendency, with its stimulation policy; and he who observes the petulant carping and retort of today, and straightway concludes that things are as bad as ever, is as foolish as he who, seeing that there are objections to some Republican measures and men, immediately decides that the party itself is just like another. But as the public principles and character and history of the Republican party are the noblest in the annals of the country, the Representatives in Congress should take care that their public manners correspond.

A DEAD LOCK.

A LATE dispatch from Washington says that "upon the question of the respective powers of the two Houses in relation to treaties there seems to be a dead lock." The point of the difference is that the House of Representatives claims the right of deciding for itself whether it will appropriate the money which may be required to fulfill a treaty, and without which the treaty would be void. "This is, in fact, a question of power to make a treaty which involves the payment of money; and is it a very important question whether such authority is according to the spirit of the Constitution, or whether the House is bound by the action of the President and Senate.

When the clause in regard to treaties was considered in the Constitutional Convention this difficulty was indirectly suggested, by a proposed amendment that no treaty should be binding which was not ratified by law. Mr. MADISON suggested that a distinction might be drawn, namely, that some treaties should be made by the President and Senate, and others by the whole legislature. Afterward Mr. WILSON moved to add the House of Representatives to the Senate in the clause defining the treaty-making power. But he had very little support, and the Virginia intervention the clause was objected to, as giving the President and the Senate authority to dismember the territory of the Union. But it was denied by Mr. MADISON. The chief paper in the Federalist defending the treaty-making clause was written by JOHN JAY. But not in that, nor in all the discussion of the subject, was it suggested that, by refusing an appropriation essential to the fulfillment of a treaty, the House of Representatives might exercise an absolute veto upon the power expressly granted to the President and Senate.

The Constitution gives the President authority, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur;" and it provides that "all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." In view of these provisions, after the President and Senate had made the treaty for buying Alaska, could the House, by refusing the appropriation, have nullified it? If it could, is it not a very essential part of the treaty-making power, and one that is justly inherent in the distinct refusal of the Constitutional Convention to make it so?

The object sought by Governor SEWARD'S resolution, that a treaty should be binding until ratified by law, is secured by the constitutional provision as it stands. The clause making the treaty the supreme law of the land is its enacting clause as law. When it is made according to the Constitution, the treaty binds the United States and every department of the government, as well as the judges in every State. The House of Representatives has no more power to repeal it than to repeal, upon the ground that it does not approve it, it usurps an authority which was constitutionally withheld, and takes part in making treaties. And even if the broad claim should be made that the House holds the purse, is of course by virtue of the Constitution, which, in the case of treaties involving money, has, so far as regards the treaty stipulations, reserved the control of the purse to the Senate and President.

Yet the right claimed by the House is not likely to be surrendered. Members will plead that they can not vote money for a purpose which they do not approve, and that if they must vote, they can not evade the responsibility which by that necessity is inlodgeon them. To a treaty which, by its own terms, can not be carried out but by the action of the House, the House will claim that it is necessarily a party, and must use its discretion. It was understood long ago, when the St. Thomas treaty was pending, that, even if the Senate ratified it, the House would not make the appropriation. And certainly there was no way of compelling it. The result will be that no treaty involving the payment of money will be actually operative except by the consent of the House. Mr. WILSON'S amendment, which was rejected in the Convention, is thus virtually approved by the practice of the country; and Mr. MADISON'S objection, that, for some treaties, the concurrence of the whole legislature should be required, is virtually adopted.

A HOME QUESTION.

THE Indian difficulty seems to be almost hopeless. Two influential chiefs have just been at Washington and New York, seeking to come to some understanding. They are scarcely back again upon the plains—the RED CLOUD has been banished—when the black cloud rolls up, and we are told that we are to have a war. If it be a general war it will be a long one; a war full of atrocities and involving enormous expense; and when those comes a lull called peace, we shall find that the Indian evil is an immense increase of the debt and a slight decrease of the Indian population. It is not very easy to discover what the present misunderstanding was between the Government and RED CLOUD. His complaint, however rhetorically sweet up in the reports, was very distinct. It was the old story of bad faith. "You are the strong power," he says. "You ask us to make a treaty. We make it, and you break it." And that is undoubtedly the truth. Yet it must be allowed that the Indians are a wild and impracticable race; that contact with civilization corrupts them; and that, if we break treaties, they are also treacherous and ferocious. We must deal with facts, not with theories nor hopes nor wishes. It can not be honestly said, for instance, that the approach of the white race and civilization have made the Indian cruel. They found him so.

Shall they, then, be exterminated? If the above suggestions be denounced as inhuman, it is evident that we must do something else than fight them perpetually. But if we find that we can not manage them from without, can we not manage them from within? If, for instance, RED CLOUD and others be really chiefs of influence, why not make them effectively amenable? Why not prove to them the generous intention of the Government, show them its willingness to atone literally for injuries, explain to them the difficulties which necessarily surround the subject, persuade them that it is not hostile but friendly, and so win the hearts and command the tribes? MACAULAY, in his essay upon "RANKE'S HISTORY," says that the administrative genius of the Roman Church shows itself conspicuously in turning to account every kind of material, every whim and prejudice and fanaticism and infirmity. Instead of alienating the discontented or the zealous to withdraw as sects, it organizes them as orders. LOYOLA, at Oxford, would have heeded a secession; JOHN WESLEY, at Rome, would have been made general of a new society in the Church.

The Indian policy is as vast in the government of a country as in that of a Church. Is it wholly impracticable in our Indian policy? Is it impossible to prove to these chiefs, and to their brethren that their highest interest lies in friendly relations with us, relations that we will honorably maintain? If, indeed, it is wholly impossible—if RED CLOUD is a mere grizzly bear, and it would be as reasonable to attempt conciliation with the buffaloes—then the Indian, which seems to be the theory of some, let us act accordingly. There is no prohibition upon hunting Indians. Every hunter may go and shoot at his own risk. We propose no buffalo treaties; we have no buffalo reservations. If the buffalo are running horned herds, the only care we need have is to prevent them from goring the frontier. But if they are not buffaloes we must act differently. If we treat Indians with them, we must insist that they be observed. The Chinese question excites Congress to that extent that it passes its resolutions upon unhandsome epithets in the freest manner. Is there nobody in Congress from the West familiar with the methods of the Indian question who is interested enough to propose an honorable and feasible policy?

PRUSSIA AND FRANCE.

IF General PRIM really wishes to place a German prince upon the throne of Spain, it is the most remarkable event of the revolution in that country. That he thinks Spain must have a king, because a republic seems to him, as probably also to CASTELLAR, impracticable, is very likely; but that he supposes any other than a Spaniard could be a suitable monarch for Spaniards is very difficult to understand. The experiment of foreign kings has been tried in previous history. The Bavarian OTHO in Greece, and his successor, the Danish GEORGE, are not enticing examples, and the fate of the Austrian MAXIMILIAN in Mexico is a melancholy warning. If Prince LEOPOLD supposes that a foreigner could sit peacefully upon the Spanish throne, he is clearly incompetent to undertake the task. If he supposes otherwise, it is inconceivable that he should wish to try it. It certainly is not an extravagant presumption that General PRIM, believing a king to be indispensable, also believes that he must be a Spaniard, and that when it is proved to be impossible to find one of the Spanish blood royal, and impracticable to crown one of any other royal house in Europe, it will be necessary to "create" a king; and since ESPARTERO is not available, who so promising as the leader of the revolution, who has vainly searched Europe for a monarch, and "which is name" is Prim!

But, on the other hand, if the Cortes—the immediate and elected representatives of the people of Spain—invites Prince LEOPOLD to become king, and the Prince accepts, it would seem to be peculiarly the affair of the Spaniards and the Prince. But does NAPOLEON declares that under no pretext would France permit a foreign prince to sit upon the throne of Spain. It is not, however, very long since LOUIS NAPOLEON was entirely willing that a German prince should sit upon the throne of MEXICO. But in the Mexican case it was an Austrian who was the humble servant of the Emperor NAPOLEON. In the Spanish case it would be a Prussian and the pupil of the French Emperor's master in state-craft. LOUIS NAPOLEON, therefore, of course, is that if Prussia under BISMARCK, which shall unite to the Rhine and which has recently eclipsed the French prestige, shall also plant itself along the Pyrenees, that prestige would be grievously diminished. To prevent such a result he would be willing to go to war; and, after the late election, he feels himself able to make it.

Such a contest begun by France would be an old balance-of-power war. If the Spaniards prefer a German PRINCE LEOPOLD to a French BONAPARTE for king—if they choose to call themselves to Prussia rather than to France—they have an unquestionable right to do so. The principle of LOUIS NAPOLEON would be intolerable, because it is one that would lead to endless disorder. It would renew the wasting war of the Spanish succession. It has been somewhere said that if Prussia persists it would be on her part a mere dynastic war. But if she persists, what is it that she persists in? Merely in permitting one of her princes to accept the invitation of the Spanish people. This makes all the difference. If PRUSSIA had asserted a claim to the Spanish throne, or had proposed to set one of her princes upon it without a request from the people, such a war would have been unjustifiable. But Prussia refusing to allow France to interfere with her acceptance of the Spanish invitation, and by no fairly held responsible for a war which France may choose to undertake—a war which, on the part of France, would be an attempt to make her self regulate the alliance of Prussia and Spain.

But the result is not one to be decided by reason. After the declaration of the French Empire, a general war would seem to be inevitable, unless Spain or Prussia should recede. And it might seem certain that one or both would do so except for the fact that BISMARCK is a greater statesman than LOUIS NAPOLEON, and must have considered every probability. The amount of firmness was of course expected by him. After the pêle-mêle the character of that protest could not have been doubtful. That he did not expect it is incredible. That he should be willing to withdraw when it is made is not easily conceivable; for it would be to forfeit his renown for astuteness. That he is willing to measure swords with France, or involve Europe in war, seems doubtful. The situation is, therefore, one of peculiar and profound interest.

RUNNING INTO DEBT.

WHEN the last installment of the public debt created by the war of 1812 was ready to be paid—preparations having been made for the purpose during the administration of GEORGE MADISON—its payment was delayed through the instrumentality of the Bank of the United States, in order to wait, as was charged, for the creation of an equivalent amount of State debt, so that the money might be retained in this country. An examination of the condition of the State debt at that early period will show that it grew up in the progress in which the last installments of the national debt were paid or expected to be paid. At a triennial meeting of the stockholders of the Bank of the United States, held in Philadelphia while this process was going on, a resolution was passed that the thanks of the stockholders were due to the Board of Directors "for the distinguished aid which they had furnished in preventing the payment of the public debt from interfering with the course and value of pecuniary investments, and with the currency of the country." The meaning of which is, that through the instrumentality of the bank the inter installments of the debt had been shifted over upon the shoulders of the States. The object of sending Mr. CRAWFORD to Europe as was supposed to be to gain time on behalf of the bank to pay the foreign creditor; but, although it escaped observation at the time, the true purpose undoubtedly was to negotiate for substituting the one for the other, while at home the creation of State securities was to be encouraged.

The State debt grew more rapidly in Pennsylvania, where the parent bank was located, than in any other State. The secret hostility to the policy of the administration, which, in the view of those who had a horror of debt, this action was supposed to embrace, made it quite apparent that the bank was not the agency to be trusted with that duty. Institutions of that character will seldom take part in the policy of contemporary life as involved in the sending specie abroad to pay off the public debt. An exaggerated estimate of the power of the country was made at that time because of the supposed rapid payment of the whole debt. The portion of it thus shifted over upon the States still appears as an existing charge as to which the trial of payment is still to be endured.

The United States is now repeating this experience. It appears from the statements of MR. WELLS, Commissioner of Internal Revenue—such a report of that office, addressed to MR. A. T. STEWART, we were furnished in advance of its publication—that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, the public debt balance against us for the year on the imports and exports of merchandise, for interest on maturities, for pensions, and for such claims as the cess of freights carried in foreign bottoms, and for the expenses of Americans abroad, was about $143,000,000. It appears from the recent approximate estimate for the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1870, that the balance against us for the same items for the year will amount probably to $182,000,000. It appears that for the first ten months of the fiscal year specie to the amount of $77,000,000 had been exported, leaving the residue of the $182,000,000 to be met with securities!

The contingency of the public debt in frequent installments—a measure which is the distinguishing feature of the Administration—has been one of the chief reasons for keeping all manner of State, city, and corporate securities, which have been sent abroad, since the inauguration of the war, equal to the full amount largely in excess of the total sum paid off by the government. More than twelve hundred millions of securities have been sent to Europe since the termination of the war, mainly for extravagance in some of its forms, and we are still sending them at the rate of scores. The principal stands as an encumbrance to be severely felt when the process of paying interest in gold is finally abandoned, and that of paying it to the foreigner in additional securities.

The debt of Great Britain is but little felt, because it is held chiefly by subjects of the kingdom. The holder of it pays in the shape of taxes a large part of the interest due to themselves; but we are soon to find that ours, to the extent held abroad, will constitute a serious charge upon our industry, our exchanges, and incessant drain upon our resources. What the country wants is a comprehensive policy that shall stop the further creation of debt, and place its industry in a situation to meet the coming burden.

We have no means of testing the accuracy of MR. WELLS's approximate estimate submitted to MR. STEWART, in answer to inquiries from him; but supposing the amount to be correct, what are we drifting? The estimate involves a vast amount of detail which can be commanded only by the means and power of the government. The examination includes a complete view of what emigrants bring over, of the extent of the smuggling, of the excessive valuations made with a view to advances, and the under-valuation of imports, with a view to save duties. No other exposition has been attempted, and it would be vain for any private person to do so. The duty of informing the country of the true balances, and of arresting in the proprietorship and management of the paper, promise that it is not only to maintain but to advance its high character. The public is well known, and MR. SMITH brings from the Albany Morning Express a well-earned reputation, not only of great familiarity with public affairs, and the best editorial tact, but of admirable accomplishment, of a thoughtful and generous mind, of the loftiest principles, and of an unfailing spirit and courtesy, which are invaluable to a journalist and to any journal.

MANY ladies of the city have engaged in what is well called "The Flower Charity," the distribution of bouquets and flowers and books among the hospitals, and especially at Bellevue and Blackwell's Island. MR. BRENNAN, the Warden of the Penitentiary, very heartily acknowledges the grateful service, and we know that it is warmly approved by the physicians and surgeons in charge. There are wilderness of beautiful flowers blooming in the neighborhood of the city, flowers which would be an inexpressible blessing to the weary eyes and hearts in the hospitals, and to those who own those pleasant gardens which are wasting their sweets, we commend these words from one of the ladies, who is deeply interested in this good work:

"I wish every one who sends us flowers or fruit could see the pleasure they give, and how the women look out for us. At Bellevue, the other day, we heard a woman in bed call out: 'They're coming!' and then there was a general stir and look of pleasure among them all. One of them said to us: 'You don't know, Miss, what company the flowers are at night, when it's so lonesome.' Only a step—they do smell so sweet."

Two of our ladies went to Blackwell's Island one day with one basket of flowers, eighty bouquets, and enough strawberries to give small taste to all the inmates. The same day we took one basket and three bunches of flowers, some strawberries, and several pounds of hot-house grapes up to Bellevue. The effect was very delicious. There was one convicted old woman, especially, who had them, and said, every time one of us passed her bed, 'Them flowers I haven't tasted any thing since I lay down here that was good enough for me to put into my mouth before.'

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

July 8.—In the Senate, the Naturalization bill was under discussion, but no definite action was taken.—In the House, a bill was passed for establishing the conveyance of Indian reservations by treaty to the Pottawatomie Indians from the United States, and for the protection of settlers on the public domain, and also confirming the location of public lands in certain States and Territories except under the pre-emption and homestead laws.

July 4.—The Senate was in session, having refused to take a recess over the Fourth. The Naturalization bill was taken up, and an amendment adopted to strike the word "white" from the naturalization laws.

July 5.—The Senate passed the amended Civil Rights bill, discarding the Test oath, by a vote of 38 to 9.—In the House, a bill to aid Washington, Iowa, and Keokuk railroad, in aid of the Postal Telegraph, presented a report in favor of the bill, which was ordered printed, and recommitted the session as near in operation throughout the United States. The report was ordered to be printed, and to be taken up for consideration in December next.

July 6.—In the Senate, the Naturalization Committee on the Currency bill reported that they had adopted the bill as passed by the Senate, with a modification adding that the currency to be issued at fifty-four millions. Provided that the Secretary of the Treasury may issue of this fifty-four millions to the United States, and for a redistribution when the issue of the fifty-four millions has been made. The report was adopted, and the bill was adopted. Most of the session was devoted to the discussion of the Naturalization question.

July 8.—In the Senate, a bill to relieve about seventy-five Revolutionary pensioners from civil disabilities passed, after the names of Gustavus W. Smith and Basil Duke had been stricken out. In the House, the General Civil Disability bill, relieving about five thousand of persons suffering from disabilities, was passed after certain names had been stricken therefrom.—In the House, the Naturalization bill was taken up, and after debate the Democratic substitute for the Republican Declaratory bill, for which both parties claimed the authorship, and repudiating the mode of ratifying Constitutional amendments was passed by a vote of 138 to 54. The bill makes it lawful for the United States officers to certify a repeal of a naturalization when once made, and affixes a penalty of fine and imprisonment for a person who by repeal such naturalization when once consummated.

July 9.—In the Senate, the Civil Rights bill passed very nearly as reported. The question of a pension to Mrs. Lincoln was discussed, but not acted upon. The appropriation for the Polar expedition was reduced to $50,000.—In the House, the Senate bill to amend the Act of 1868 and 1870 relative to the naturalization of persons, striking out all special taxes, was concurred in. The Senate bill in relation to the Civil Rights bill, making the rate two and a half per cent., was sustained. The Democratic substitute for the Republican bill was rejected. The amendment in regard to sugars was then adopted. The bill as amended was passed, and ship and railway bags each a quarter per cent. per pound were both adopted. The Senate bill as amended was acted on, and those non-concurred in were referred to a Conference Committee.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THERE is great stagnation and excitement in Europe over the threatening attitude of France and Prussia. The former has already been driven to the last extremes to sovereign, the Prince of Hohenzollern, and accepted the Spanish throne. Napoleon claims that the future of an insult and menace on the part of Spain and Prussia. The Spaniard had the French minister withdraw. Prussia explained that the Prince was not a candidate for the throne, but that if the people should prefer him to any other, and that either course would be agreeable to her sovereign. England and Austria decline to be drawn into the dispute. It is reported that Prussia has refused to withdraw the candidature of Prince Leopold, and that France has refused to accept the withdrawal from the candidature. Spain and Prussia declined

THE CHINESE IN NEW ENGLAND.

THE illustrations on this page afford our readers a view of the locality of the new movement which has created such a furor among the working-people of the Northern States. The story is a brief and simple one. Mr. SAMPSON, a large shoe manufacturer of North Adams, Massachusetts, finding that the expenses of his business were fast outrunning his profits, proposed to his workmen last spring a slight reduction in wages. After taking the matter into consideration the workmen sent him word, through a committee, that, if he would permit them to inspect his books, they would decide whether the state of his business required such a reduction. Mr. SAMPSON naturally declined the inspection of his private affairs; and finding the workmen unwilling to come to an understanding on any other terms, he determined to see what could be done with the Chinese. Accordingly he sent a confidential agent to San Francisco to procure the services of a certain number of Celestial immigrants. The agent, as is well known, succeeded in this mission. It should be understood that the immigrants came east of their own volition, and that Mr. SAMPSON's enterprise has no connection whatever with that of Mr. KOOPMANSCHOOF.

One of our illustrations represents the workroom in Mr. SAMPSON's manufactory, where the Chinese are employed. They are put to one branch only of the business—that of fastening on the soles. The cutting, stitching, and finishing are operations performed by others in other apartments. The men are intelligent and smart, and very readily learn the management of machinery. Since their arrival in North Adams their department has been excellent, and the prejudice at first existing against them is said to be gradually giving way.

North Adams, as our sketch of the place shows, is a pleasantly situated, thriving manufacturing village. The large building in the centre of the fore-ground is Mr. SAMPSON's factory, where the new experiment with imported laborers is going on.

DISLIKE TO SERMONS.

WHY is it so much the fashion to profess a dislike to sermons? At first sight there would seem to be a certain branch of our ordinary customs. Few men, and scarcely any women, would have the courage to say that they disliked the prayers; why should it be permissible, or even respectable and proper, to avow a dislike for the preaching? After all, if our religious professions have any meaning, and if we hold that religious truths are more or less applicable to modern souls, we should be glad to hear the application made by an honest and able man—and there is no want of preachers who well deserve those epithets. The suggestion that the truths are too trite to be impressive would be to the purpose if it were the function of preachers to demonstrate first principles of morality; but it is the highest task of all poets and orators to exhibit the eternal freshness of great truths; and they are never more effectively employed than in giving new force to the most obvious of maxims. It would be as sensible to say that landscape painting is henceforth impossible because the sea and the sky have been represented so often. It is equally far from the real point to say that we can read instead of listen. We do not go to a great speaker to be persuaded, but to be infected. The whole theory of eloquence depends upon a law of nature which has been illustrated by innumerable anecdotes. Such, for example, is the old story of the man who persuaded a crowd that a certain stone lion wagged his tail by the simple expedient of asserting it in public with an air of conviction. There is no proposition, however ludicrous, for which you can not obtain proselytes, if you will only persuade people not that it is capable of demonstration, but that you personally believe in it.

CHAPTER IV.

Exploring Expeditions.—The Signal Station.—Shooting Cormorants.—Adventure with Seals.—Picturesque Coast Scenery.—Forcing Way through the Thickets.

THE work of building their cabin and constructing the furniture which they provided for it consumed a great deal of time. The labor extended, in fact, through the summer, and the month of March, that is the commencement of the fall, set in before they were ready to occupy it. During the time while they had been chiefly employed in this work various excursions were made by different members of the party, with a view of exploring the shores and the interior of this island. Some of these expeditions were connected with their work, having for their object the finding and bringing in of materials required in the construction. Others were for observation, in hopes that they might see, from an eminence, some vessel passing by. On one of the first of these excursions they set up a signal flag, to call the attention of the people on board any such vessel as might come in sight. They chose for this purpose a high and prominent peak near the mouth of Port Carsley, the great bay into which they had entered when they first arrived at the island, and in one of the inner branches of which the vessel was wrecked. They went down the bay to the place which they had chosen for the signal, in the boat, taking with them the materials necessary for the work. When they reached the spot they set up a tall and stout pole, with a flag displayed at the top of it. The pole was braced by cords fastened to stout stakes set in the ground at a short distance from the pole, on different sides. Underneath the flag they lashed securely to the pole a bottle, tightly corked, and containing written directions for finding their camp, for the guidance of any person who might see the flag and come to the spot.

Several of the excursions were made on the water, by means of the boat. In these cases they coasted along the shores of the great bay, and explored the various islands and capes and inlets, to see what discoveries they could make that might promise to be useful to them. Sometimes they met with unexpected good fortune in these expeditions. In returning from their excursion to the mouth of the bay to set up their signal pole, in coming round a certain point of land, they started up a large flock of sea-birds, called cormorants, from the rocks before them. Mr. Raynal seized his double-barrelled gun, and, by the discharge of both barrels, brought down twenty-six of the birds, which the men took with them to their camp. They found the flesh rank and oily, but it was less disagreeable than the flesh of the seals. And at any rate it was a change for them.

They saw at different times, in the course of these excursions, a great number of seals. Sometimes the seals were swimming in the water, and sometimes basking in the sun along the shore. As is generally the case with animals living upon uninhabited islands, they showed very little fear of man. Indeed the sight of the boat and the men in it seemed to awaken in them sentiments of anger and ferocity rather than of fear. At one time a great number of sea-lions were swimming in a bay which the boat entered, and as soon as the boat came in sight they gathered around it, actuated, as their motions seemed to indicate, partly by curiosity and partly by a feeling of rage and defiance. They perhaps regarded the boat with its occupants as some novel kind of marine monster, and soon appeared to conclude that it was an enemy, and began to gather around it, evidently with hostile intentions. Some of them, more bold than the others, came up near and began to bite at the ends of the oars. At last one of them—a monster in size and strength —seized the bow of the boat and came very near upsetting it, which he would probably have done if Aleck had not in an instant grasped the boat-hook and hit him a blow with it upon his head, which made him let go his hold and swim away roaring with rage and pain. He left deep marks of his teeth on the gunwale of the boat. The men kept the others at bay by striking at them with their oars and with the boat-hook until they had passed out of their way.

They found a favorable place for landing soon after this; and on going on shore they discovered two young seals asleep under the trunk of a fallen tree. They killed them and carried them home in the boat. They found the flesh of these whelps much more tender and palatable than that of the mature, or nearly mature, animals that they had eaten before.

Some of the excursions which they thus made by water along the coasts were quite extended, and not unfrequently they found the scenery and the conformation of the rocks extremely picturesque. As they had a sail to their boat, they could go to considerable distances with comparatively little fatigue. At one time, however, when they were about ten miles from home, they found the wind coming in dead against them, on their return, and they were obliged to row back against it all the way. They reached their tent—for this was while the cabin was in process of construction—almost entirely exhausted by fatigue. Besides these little voyages along the coast, they sometimes made excursions into the interior, though these were, of course, attended with much greater difficulty than expeditions by sea. Within a very few days after the wreck two of the seamen, George and Harry, made the first attempt to penetrate into the interior, with a view of reaching, if possible, the summit of a mountain which rose a short distance from the place where they had landed. They accomplished their object, though they met with very great difficulty in making their way through the almost impenetrable thickets, which they found extended from near the shore to the foot of the mountains. These thickets were so dense, and the branches of the trees and bushes grew so low, and were so gnarled and stiff, that the men had to crawl on their hands and knees through an opening made by the seals, over wet and boggy ground, and swamps interspersed with pools of water. In some places they had to stop and cut their way with their knives. They, however, finally succeeded, and gained the comparatively open country which lay around the base of the mountain. There they had only steep and nearly naked rocks to climb till they reached the summit.

There they were repaid for their fatigue by the magnificence of the view which extended all around them. The whole group of islands lay at their feet. Their eyes could follow the contour of the shore, and could trace the forms of the smaller islands, which were separated from the central one, on which they stood, by narrow and tortuous channels of water. The interior consisted of bold and rugged peaks of rock, rising high in the air, the sides and summits nearly destitute of vegetation, but hemmed in below by the dense and entangled thickets which they had been passing through. The peaks and pinnacles which were seen in all directions were of the most fantastic forms. To some of the most prominent of these they gave names. There was one they called the Giant's Peak, and another near it, which bore some fancied resemblance to a sepulchral monument, received ne the name of the Giant's Tomb. The men returned from their excursion at night entirely spent with fatigue and exposure, and they sat down in the tent to their supper of cold roast seal with a most excellent appetite.

In some of the excursions that they made by land they followed the coasts, instead of penetrating into the interior; but this was difficult, on account of the broken and precipitous rocks and the deep chasms and indentations which every where bordered the shore. In some of the first of these attempts to follow the shore on land very soon after they commenced building their cabin. For some time they encountered great difficulty on account of the roughness of the way. At length they came to a stream, which they were obliged to ford. After passing this stream they came suddenly upon something like a beach, which afforded them for a time easy walking; and they found it perfectly delightful to be able to walk along on smooth and level ground without any difficulties or obstructions. It was the first time since they landed that they had enjoyed such a luxury.

Their chief object, in this expedition, was to procure seals for food. Soon after they passed the beach a monstrous sea-lion came up out of the sea, and advanced to attack them. George went forward to meet him, and hit him as hard a blow with a club with which he was armed as he could muster. He immediately turned and began to kill him on the spot. He described the sound as terrible, like a howling sound in the thicket, and on going to the place they found two young seals in their lair. It was probably to protect his family that the old seal had come out of the water to attack the intruders.

The young seals looked up piteously to the men, as if imploring mercy; and their eyes had so sad and intelligent an expression that they found it very hard to resist their appeal. But their own necessities were too urgent to allow of their yielding to any feelings of sentiment; so they killed the poor things, and carried them home.

CHAPTER V.

A Government regulated.—The Rules and Regulations.—The Civil Service.—Mr. Raynal's experimental Finding.—Among the new Mechanicals.

THE work of finishing the cabin and making explorations consumed the whole summer. It was not until the 5th of March that the party was ready for occupancy. Thus far there had been no organization of the party of any kind, nor any authority or subordination of any sort, the natural deference and submission felt by the seamen toward those who had been clothed with official authority on board the vessel, but whose authority, of course, ceased entirely when the vessel was wrecked. The subordination that is resulting from habit was doubtless greatly strengthened and increased by the conviction, on the part of the men, of the superior education, intelligence, and skill of Mr. Raynal and Captain Musgrave, and of their ability to judge best in respect to what was to be done. Every thing had gone on tolerably well thus far under this system.

There had been some disputes, and occasionally some practical inconvenience, from the want of an organized government and authority in theory; still the work had gone on, upon the whole, very satisfactorily. Mr. Raynal thought, however, that now since it was possible that they might be obliged to remain on the island during the whole winter, even if they were declined ever to be released, it was desirable to establish some formal system of organization, and that the time of taking possession of the cabin would be a favorable opportunity for inaugurating it.

The 5th of March was the day, as stated above, on which the cabin was finished, ready for occupancy. They built a great fire in the fireplace on the morning of that day, and spent the forenoon in moving in their goods and chattels from the tent. Most of the remainder of the day was occupied with arranging things and "getting settled;" and, when night came, they made up their beds upon the rude bedsteads which they had erected for bedsteads, and went to bed, when the time came, each in his own room.

During the night, Mr. Raynal revolved in his mind the particulars of his proposed organization, and made up his plan. He began to get the forenoon in moving in their goods and chattels, d from the crowded and not over-cleanly streets the neighborhood.

In February, 1864, the greater part of these buildings was destroyed by fire—a large hall devoted to the purposes of a museum, and in which we accumulated a large and valuable collection specimens illustrating the natural history and ology of the Pei-chih-li province, alone escaping n flames. New buildings were, however, speedi erected, the Chinese officials themselves assisti g in laying the foundation-stones; and one of e most complete mission stations in the East ok the place of that destroyed. The authorities China were justifiably proud of this establishment, the principal portion of which—the cathedral—has, according to the confirmed telegram, been burned down.

Although it is stated that Prince does not intend to dispatch a special expedition to China, e may rest assured that the French squadron in he China seas will exact ample reparation for he outrage. Napoleon III. has long wanted an excuse for taking possession of the Northern provinces; and we shall not be surprised to learn, next, under the pretext of holding a "interni guarantee" for the fulfillment of terms improperly made almost impossible of fulfillment, the French ricolor will before long be found waving over the richly auriferous district of Shantung. Such an event could not fail to exercise a marked and, perhaps, unfavorable influence upon American interests in North China.

THE BOYS' CELL.

[See Illustration on Page 474.]

Warns the frowning walls of the sombre Tombs
Look dismally down,
There, 'mid the studded and echoing glooms,
In the heart of the town
That with noise and trouble and tumult chafes,
Is a cell for the boys, those vagrant waifs,
Caught in their school
Where vice is the rule,
And virtue a flower that never blooms.

In that gloomy cell, which no sunbeam cheers
With its mellow ray,
Where at dull intervals one hears
All through the day
The clang of the iron-grated doors,
And the echo of feet on the cold stone floors,
These boys, from the gloom
Of their dungeon-room,
Stare at each visitor's face that appears.

Some of them mere children yet,
With no home but the street,
Just such vermin as have no notice of fear
With shoeless feet,
Sweeping the pavements clean and dry,
Or blacking the boots of some passer-by;
And others older,
With bigger bulder,
On whose features the seal of vice is set.

All huddled together in that grim cell,
Where such clothing does
Sounds in the subject like a knell,
And the city's care
Is scarce heard through the thick and frowning walls;
There, where the shade of the twilight falls
Early each day,
And where no sun's ray
Of God's beautiful world creeps in to tell.

Only a plank upon which to lie
Through the lonely night,
While the long, dark hours go silently by
In their noiseless flight,
Forming a picket-guard to keep,
There in the cell, while the others sleep,
The rats at bay
That, till break of day,
With hungry purpose in dozens draw nigh.

Just outside of the grated door,
Gloomy and vast,
Is the corridor, with its hard stone floor,
Where the grim watch are kept
Deeper gloom, and where all night long
The loathsome whiskered enemy throng,
Wrangle and scold,
And, with hunger grown bold,
Force their way in through the iron-barred door.

So, with these grim walls bounding their view,
Here in the cell,
With never a glimpse of the sky's sweet blue—
How long who can tell?
Till their foster-mother, the City, shall make
Some other provision for charity's sake.
These boys must remain,
Living again
Each day over with nothing new.

Oh, you who have homes, and to whom the joys
Of your hearths are dear,
How different your lot from the lot of these boys,
Your comfort or cheer!
How different your lives, with the feeling of love
Making each like the home of the angels above,
To the liver dark with doom
In the direst prison's gloom!
Oh, God bless our homes and hallow their joys!

PLEASURE-HUNTING.

We really do not know how to amuse ourselves, and are forced to snatch at the first pretext that offers itself, and to make believe so hard that we are really enjoying ourselves. It is a duty we all yet generally recognize—namely, the art of pleasure-hunting. We are no more capable of amusing ourselves than of fencing or playing the fiddle without careful training and long practice. If the object of recreation were to increase the sum of human happiness, we should certainly inculcate the cultivation of the faculties which are immediately pleasant to the individual, as well as of those which are more indirectly profitable to his race. It is a very good thing to be scrupulously honest and industrious; but the most industrious and honest of men may lead a wretchedly bare and unprofitable life. Why should he not study the theory of deriving the greatest possible amount of innocent enjoyment from the world which he inhabits, as well as that of doing good to other people? Two practical rules would probably result from such an inquiry. The first would be the extreme importance to every man of providing himself with a good serviceable hobby. Even a cultivated taste for cookery or wines is better than nothing, so long as it is kept within certain bounds; and not only provides a man with an interesting pursuit, but certainly promotes the comfort of his friends. We may admit, indeed, that this is about the lowest limit of permissible pleasure-seeking; but is it a fair question with humanity, whether it is better to spend a day better in yawning about a race-course without any taste for horse-flesh, or in pursuing by moderation a course of experimental inquiry into the art of dining? There is another rule, however, which is of equal importance, and may be more unreservedly stated. What an enormous advance would be at once made in the art of happiness if people could only be persuaded to a tolerable degree of sincerity! The principle would run thus: Do not waste those pleasures which every body really likes, but for which, for some arbitrary fashion, it is considered a sort of contempt; as there are many things which every body hates, and yet which every one is afraid to denounce. Let us have more pretensions to sound art, is, that both artists and their admirers are by no means inclined to it, and we recommended by some preconceived theory as to overlook the important question whether they really give and receive pleasure. It is true that, when we know whether a poem or a picture pleases, there is a further question whether it ought to please; but when the fashion is perpetrating such kind leaves us in complete uncertainty as to the first point, subsequent handwriting is apt to be very unsatisfactory. There would be in our sense no disputing about tastes if we only knew which tastes were really there. We might still ask whether they were elevated; but as it is, the first, and almost the only question is, whether we really like a so-called pleasure, or only persuade ourselves that we like it.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

ALMOST every summer there comes a time, after a long season of drought, when a warning-note is sounded to indicate that there is a short supply of Croton water. So simple are our reservoirs, and so accustomed are our citizens to a lavish use of this indispensable article, that there is a general impression there is no possibility of any failure in the supply. The Commissioner of Public Works, however, appears to be a prudent man, who forestalls the evil, and means to guard against it. He has issued a notice of the great waste of water, particularly on the piers in the lower part of the city, and warns the consumers that a waste of reckless expenditure. That there is need of care may be inferred from the fact that it is stated that the water supply over that 50,000,000 of gallons used every day in the city during the last season. All good citizens should heed their aid to insure compliance with such measures as will prevent even the fear of a lack of water.

Working-women are wanted in Colorado. Reliable reports say that a thousand could find immediate employment there, and at high wages. A competent girl commands better wages there than a male laborer.

Great Salt Lake has been a sort of mystery to scientific and geographic explorers. It has been supposed that its waters were kept at a uniform level by the process of evaporation, since no outlet was known, and yet it was fed by many streams from the Rocky Mountains. Recently, however, the mystery is thought to be solved in the discovery of a subterranean channel in a voyage on the lake a schooner was caught in the vortex of a maelstrom. The captain of the vessel states that during the detention caused by the accident the deck was far lower than the water outside the whirlpool, and that he owes the safety of vessel and men to the stiff breeze which fortunately sprang up at the time. The theory is that the waters at the bottom are noted that some mighty airless cavity below gave strength to the notion, and the fact that floating trees above was like the boiling of a mammoth caldron. It is inferred from this that there is a subterranean Salt Lake, and that probably there may be other similar outlets.

Relapsing Fever has, to a very great extent, disappeared from New York city. About nine months ago this disease have been recorded since its first recognized appearance, and about one hundred and fifty deaths.

A favorite actress was recently singing a new song, entitled "Guess Who," and when she came to the lines,

"Some one I'm wishing and longing to see,
Some one I'm thinking of constantly," an enthusiastic individual in the parquet sprang to his feet and exclaimed, "Hold on, madam! I'll bet you a dollar and dollars if I was the man!" The audience were slightly amused.

Victor Hugo is reported to be suffering with a disease of the eye, which necessitates his dictating whatever he desires to have written.

The famous Russian violinist, M. De Kontski, and his daughter Vera, the pianist, appeared performed before the Sultan, in Constantinople. His Majesty was so delighted with both artists that he conferred the decoration of the Medjidie on the father, and added a donation of 10,000 francs for the evening's entertainment.

A well-known Protestant clergyman has been for some time visiting Roman Catholic houses for the purpose of thoroughly fitting himself to write an important work on Romanism. This has given rise to the rumor that he has become a Catholic.

At Brussels the first communion of the Princess Louise has been the great event. The young Princess has just attained her twelfth year, and is considered the living likeness of her aunt, the Empress Charlotte. The Empress is in a sling state, but no opinion was made to her case to the usage, independent in all Catholic countries, of seeking a benediction from every one in the family upon the day of the first communion of her daughter. The Empress is one of greater consequence than even the Princess Clementine. Even the poor Empress had been made to understand that a ceremony of importance was about to occur, and she insisted on rising from her bed and attiring herself in her favorite dress of white silk, trimmed with black lace, and putting on her most beloved ornaments to welcome her young relative. Many presents had been prepared—for it is the custom always to bestow some gift upon the day upon the new communicants—and the poor Empress sat in her arm-chair propped up with pillows, regarding with childish impatience the entrance of her little dame. The red morocco case containing the necklace and earrings she was to bestow upon her young friend, the gift of the Princess Clementine, and the little figure, attired all in white, with the snowy veil thrown over her head and bosom, passing for a minute on the threshold, advanced joyously toward her, some account of her own pride, some reminiscence of the veil and flowers, must have come across the mind of the Empress, for she spoke to the ground, and seizing the hands of the Princess Louise, covered them with kisses, looking all the while into her face with such wistful and eager expression that the poor child, quite overcome, sobbed aloud. After a while she became calm. She knelt at the Empress's footstool, and laid down the ground, shook her head mournfully, and taking from her hand a rosary

"OUT OF THE WORLD."

IN this most interesting picture MR. LEHMANN represents a scene which he witnessed years ago at the Franciscan monastery at Tivoli. In a whitewashed cell a young monk sits playing the harpsichord—one of those old-fashioned instruments still used in remote districts on the Continent, where the modern piano has not yet been introduced—and an elder monk stands listening to him. Inside the harpsichord was inscribed, in monkish Latin, this distich:

"Me vivum in silva fecit natura tacere:
Me cassum ars cogit, dulce sonare loqui:"

which is closely enough rendered by the lines:

"Living a woodland tree, to be dumb was decreed me by nature; Dead, how I sing! how I speak! such is the magic of art."

The figures in this picture compose unaffectedly; and it is said that in the original picture, exhibited at the Royal Academy in London, the simple coloring accords well with the sentiment of repose and retirement proper to the subject and title. The broad masses of color formed by the warm brown of the monks' frocks and the low-toned red pavement tiles harmonize pleasantly with the pale greenish-blue, heightened with gold, of the harpsichord-case and the cool gray of the cell wall, relieved by light and shade.

Such scenes of quiet and repose are now rare since the dissolution of so many monasteries; but, however false and mischievous the monastic conception of life, some care-worn, overtaxed toilers "in the world" may, without reproach, occasionally sigh for peace and rest as complete as is here indicated—for a refuge "out of the world" "the world forgetting, by the world forgot."

THE CAPITOL GROUNDS, WASHINGTON.

EVERY pleasant Wednesday evening all Washington crowds to the beautiful grounds at the east front of the National Capitol, to listen to the splendid music furnished by the Marine Band. There may frequently be seen the most distinguished personages in the city, the President, the heads of the several departments of the government, members of Congress, foreign embassadors, etc. The pleasantest feature of this weekly out-of-door concert is the delight which it affords the children of the city, who on these occasions are allowed the freedom of the grounds. Even running on the grass is permitted—a privilege of which they are not slow to take advantage.

In former days these concerts were always honored with the presence of CLAY, WEBSTER, CALHOUN, J. Q. ADAMS, and other great men of the generation which has just passed away, who took great delight in the society of children, and loved to take part in their innocent pastimes.

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-FOURTH.

THE SANCTUARY.

"We finished the job on the wall just before dark. I went to my cup of tea, and he went to his bottle of rum.

"I left him, drinking hard, to put our two bedrooms tidy for the night. The place that his bed happened to be set in (which I had never remarked particularly before) seemed, in a manner of speaking, to force itself on my notice now.

"The head of the bedstead was set against the wall which divided his room from mine. From looking at the bedstead I got to looking at the wall next. There was something about it that was made of. Then to napping against it with my knuckles. The sound told me there was nothing but lath and plaster under the paper. It was the same as the wall we had been at work on down stairs. We had cleared our way so far through this last—to certain places where the repairs were most needed—that we had to be exceeding hot to burst through the paper in the room on the other side. I found myself calling to mind the caution my husband had given me while we were at this part of the work, 'and to mind what he had spoken it. 'Take care you don't find your hands in a nest of vermin.' That was what he had said down in the parlor. Up in his bedroom I kept on repeating it in my own mind—with my eyes all the while on the lath, which he had moved to the inner side of the door to look himself in—till the knowledge of what it meant burst on me like a flash of light. I looked at the wall, at the bedstead, at my own two hands—and I shivered as if it were in the room.

"Hours must have passed like minutes while I was up stairs that night. I lost the sense of time. When my husband came up from his drinking, he found me in his room.

"I leave the rest untold, and pass on purposely to the main narrowing.

"No mortal eyes but mine will ever see these lines. Still, there are things a woman can't write of even to herself. I shall only say that I suffered the last and worst of many indignities at my husband's hands—at the very time when my first saw, set plainly before me, the way to take his life. He went out toward noon next day, to go his round among the public houses; and my mind being then strung up to deliver myself from him, the good and all, when he came home I was ready.

"The things we had used on the previous day were left in the parlor. I was all by myself in the house, busy on the part in question of which he had taught me. I proved myself an apt scholar. Before I had finished it in the street I had my own way prepared (in my bedroom also) to help me by laying my own hands on him—after he had locked himself up for the night.

"I don't remember feeling either fear or doubt through all those hours. I sat down to my bit of supper with no better and no worse appetite than usual. The only change in me that I can call to mind was that I felt a singular longing to have somebody with me to keep me company. Having no friend to ask in, I went to the street door and looked long at the people passing this way and that.

"A strange thing about, came up to me. Generally I dislike dogs and beasts of all kinds. I called this one in and gave him his supper. He had been naught (I suppose) in my go his hind-legs and beg for food: at any rate, that was his way of asking me for more. I thought—it seems impossible when I look back at it now, but for all that it's true—I laughed till the tears ran down my cheeks, at the little tricks of his haunches, with his ears pricked up and his head on one side and his mouth watering over the victuals. I wonder whether I was in my right senses? I don't know.

"When the dog had got all he could get he whined to be let out to roam the streets again.

"As I opened the door to let the creature go his ways, I saw my husband crossing the road to come in. 'Keep out' (I says to him); 'to-night, of all nights, keep out.' He was too drunk to heed me: he passed by, and Slumdevil his dog with him. I followed and saw that I heard him open his door, and bang it to, and lock it. I waited a bit, and went up another set of stairs. I heard him drop down set to his bed. In a minute more he was fast asleep and snoring.

"It had all happened as it was wanted to happen. In two minutes—without doing one single thing to bring suspicion on myself—I could have smothered him. I went into my own room. I took up the second of the two I had ready. I was within an inch of it—when there came a rush of something up into my head. I can't say what it was.' I can only say the horrors laid hold of me and hunted me then and there out of the house.

"I put on my bonnet, and slipped the key of the street door into my pocket. It was only half past nine—or maybe a quarter to ten. If I had any one clear notion in my head, it was the notion of running away, and never allowing myself to set eyes on the house or the husband more.

"I went up the street—and came back. I went down the street—and came back. I tried it a third time, and went round and round and round—and came back. It was not to be done. The house held me chained to it like a dog to his kennel. I couldn't keep away from it. For the life of me, I couldn't keep away from it.

"A company of gay young people in omnibuses passed me, just as I was going to let myself in again. They were in a great hurry. 'Step out,' says one of the men; 'the theatre's close by, and we shall be just in time for the farce.' I turned about and followed them. Having been goaded, brought up, I had never been inside a theatre in my life. It struck me that I might get taken, at it were, out of myself, if I saw something that was quite strange to me, and heard something that was quite unlike the things in my head.

"They went in to the pit; and I went in after them.

"The thing they called the farce had begun. Men and women came on to the stage, turn and turn about, and talked, and sang, and danced. Before long all the people about me in the pit were laughing and clapping their hands. The noise they made was deafening. I don't know how to describe the state I was in. My eyes wouldn't keep off the players: my ears wouldn't close to, and to hear what the rest of them were seeing and hearing. There must have been something, I fancy, in my mind that got helped between me and what was going on upon the stage. The play began to change for me, before the hour and a half before my husband should be home. No human ear could hear me. Alone, in the morning, I knew the worst. Alone, in the night, no human ear was heard me. Alone, in the night, no human ear will hear me, to the day of my death.

"What had the people come to speak to me, as usual. They found me dumb.

"What had happened to me in the past, when my head had been hurt, and my speech affected by it, gave a likelier look to my dumbness than it would have worn in the case of another person. They took me back again to the hospital. The doctors were kind to me, and they spared me the shock of what had taken place in the house, comparing on the back of the other shock, might, for aught they knew, have done the mischief. And others said, 'She got her speech again after the accident; there will have been no new injury time that time; the woman is shamming dumb, for some purpose of her own.' I let them dispute as they liked. No human talk was possible now to me. I had set myself apart among my fellow-creatures; I had begun my separate and silent life.

"Through all this time the sense of a coming punishment hanging over me never left my mind. I had nothing to dread from human justice. The judgment of an Avenging Providence—that was what I was waiting for.

"Friday.—They held the inquest. He had been known for years past as an inveterate drunkard; he had been seen overnight going home in liquor; he had been found locked up in his room, dead. The doctor said the door, and the latch of the window bolted also. No fire-place was in his room: nothing was disturbed or altered: nobody by human possibility could have got in. The doctor reported that he had died of congestion of the lungs; and the jury gave their verdict accordingly.

"Saturday.—Marked forever in my calendar as the memorable day on which the judgment descended on me. I had dined three o'clock in the afternoon—in the broad sunlight, under the cloudless sky, with hundreds of innocent human creatures all around me. Hester Detbridge, saw, for the first time, the Appearance which is appointed to haunt the rest of my days. I was alone and the sunshine and the cool green of trees and grass would be with me. The nearest place at which I could find what I wanted was the Regent's Park. I went into one of the quiet walks in the middle of the park, where the horses and carriages are not allowed to go, and where old people can sun themselves, and children play, without danger.

"I sat me down to rest on a bench. Among the children who were in a beautiful little boy, playing with a brand-new toy—a horse and wagon. While I was watching him busily plucking up the flowers and loading his wagon with them, I felt for the first time—what I have often and often felt since—a creeping chill come slowly over my flesh, and then a suspicion of something hidden near me, which would steal out and show itself if I looked that way.

"There was a big tree hard by. I looked toward the tree, and tried to see the something hidden appear from behind it.

"The Thing stole out, dark and shadowy in my pleasant sunlight, and I felt I saw only the dim figure of a woman. After a little it began to get plainer, brightening from within outward —brightening, brightening, brightening, till it was before me the vision of MY OWN SELF, repeated as if I was looking before a glass—the double of myself, looking at me with my own eyes, saw it move over the grass. I saw it stop behind the beautiful boy. I saw it stand and listen, as I had stood and listened at the door of morning. I saw it look through the morning silence was still and dead, he was still and dead with it.

"The rest of this history is counted in my mind by days and hours—Wednesday, Thursday, Saturday. After that it all fades off like, and the new years come with a strange look, being the years of a long life.

"What about the old life first? What did I feel, in the days that followed the morning, when I had done it?

"I don't know what I felt. I can't remember it, or I can't tell it. I don't know how I can write the history of the four days, and that's all.

"Wednesday.—I gave the alarm toward noon. Hours before, I had put things straight and fit to be seen. I had only to call for help, and to leave the people to do as they pleased. The neighbors came in, and then the police. They knocked, uselessly, at his door. Then they broke it open, and found him dead in his bed.

"But the ghost of a suspicion of guilt in that the mind of any one. There was no fear of human justice finding me out: my one unutterable dread was dread of an Avenging Providence. I had a short time—that night, and a dream, in which I did the deed over again. For a time my mind was busy with thoughts of confessing to the police, and of giving myself up. If I had not belonged to a respectable family, I should have done that. From generation to generation there had been no stain on our good name. It would be death to my father, and disgrace to all my family, if I owned what I had done, and suffered for it on the public scaffold. I prayed to be guided right from Heaven, and found a meeting, of what to do.

"I was commanded, in a vision, to open the Bible, and turn on it to set my guilty self apart among my innocent fellow-creatures from that day forth; to keep my thoughts into my hand, silent life; to dedicate the use of my speech to the language of prayer only, offered up in the solitude of my own chamber, when no human ear could hear me. Alone, in the morning, I saw the vision of the Bible. Alone, no human ear has heard me from that time. No what Geoffrey could have to do with them (being at the moment with a nurse at Ipsley Court), and why Hester Dethridge should have shown the violent agitation which had been described, were mysteries which it was impossible to penetrate.

Anne dismissed the gig with a little present and a few kind words. Under other circumstances, the incomprehensible proceedings in the house might have made her seriously uneasy. But her mind was now occupied by more pressing anxieties. Blanche's second letter (received from Hester Dethridge on the preceding evening) informed her that Sir Patrick persisted in his resolution, and that he and his nieces might be expected, some what might of it, to present themselves at the cottage on that day.

Anne opened the letter, and looked at it for the second time. The passages relating to Sir Patrick were expressed in these terms:

"I don't mind darling, you have any idea of the interest that you have roused in my uncle. Although he has not spoken to me about it, I have, with being the miserable cause of the sacrifice that you have made, he is quite as wretched and cross as he can about your ass Lawa. We talk of nobody else. He said last night that he did not believe there was ever a couple in such a fuss. Think of that from a man who has such terribly sharp eyes for the faults of women in general, and such a terribly sharp tongue in talking of them! I am pledged to secrecy; but I must tell you one other thing, which concerns Mr. Julius Hollebone's announcement that his brother refuses to consent to a separation put my uncle almost beside himself. If there is not some change for the better in your life in a few days' time, Sir Patrick will find out a way of his own—by hook or not, he doesn't care—for rescuing you from the dreadful position in which you are placed, and Arnold tells my full approval of that. Oh, him. As we understand it, you are, under one pretense or another, keep a close prisoner. Sir Patrick has already secured a post of observation near you. He and Arnold went all round the cottage last night, and examined all the doors and back garden wall, with a locksmith to help them. You will no doubt hear further about this from Sir Patrick himself. Any don't appear to know any thing of it when you see him! I am not in his confidence—but Arnold is, which comes to the same thing exactly. You will see us (I mean you will see my uncle and me) to-morrow, all quite of those who keep you under restraint, I believe. Arnold will not accompany us; he is not to be trusted (my friend himself says) with his indignation. Courage, dearest! There are two people in the world, to whom you are inestimably precious, and who are determined to see to their happiness be sacrificed. I am one of them, and (by for Heaven's sake keep this a secret also!) Patrick is the other!!!"

Absorbed in the letter, and in the conflict of opposite feelings which it roused within her, during when it turned her thoughts inward on herself, and fatigue when she was surrounded by it of the coming visit—Anne was called back to a sense of pre ent events by the reappearance of the servant, charged with a message. Mr. Bygrave well had been for some time in the cottage, and he was now waiting to see her down stairs.

Anne found the surgeon alone in the drawing-room. He apologized for disturbing her at that early hour.

"It was impossible for me to get to Fulham yesterday," he said, "and I could only make sure of complying with Lord Holchester's request by coming here before the time at which I receive patients at home. I am sorry for Mr. Delamayn, and I have requested permission to say a word to you on the subject of his health."

Anne looked through the window, and saw Geoffrey smoking his pipe—not in the back garden, as usual, but in front of the cottage, where he could keep his eye on the gate.

"Is he ill?" she asked.

"He is seriously ill," answered Mr. Speedwell. "I should not otherwise have troubled you with this interview. It is a matter of professional duty to warn you, as his wife, that he is dying."

He may be seized at any moment by a paralytic stroke. The only chance for him, a very poor one, I am bound to say—is to make him alter his present mode of life without loss of time."

"In one way he will be obliged to alter it," said Anne. "He has received notice from the landlady to quit this cottage."

Mr. Speedwell looked surprised.

"I think you will find that the notice has been withdrawn," he said. "I can only assure you that Mr. Delamayn distinctly informed me, when I arrived charge of air, that he had decided, for reasons of his own, on remaining here.

"Another in the series of incomprehensible domestic events! Hester Dethridge—on all other occasions the most immovable of women—had changed her mind!)

"Setting that aside," proceeded the surgeon, "there are very preventive measures which I am bound to suggest. Mr. Delamayn is evidently suffering (though he declines to admit it himself) from constant anxiety. If he has the chance for his life, that anxiety must be set at rest. Is it in your power to relieve it?"

"It is not even in my power, Mr. Speedwell, to tell you what it is."

The surgeon bowed, and went on:

"The second caution that I have to give you," he said, "is to keep him from drinking spirits. He admits having committed an excess in that way the night before last. In his state of health, drinking means literally death. If he goes back to the brandy-bottle—forgive me for saying it plainly; the matter is too serious to be trifled with—if he goes back to the brandy-bottle, his life, in my opinion, is not worth five minutes' purchase. Can you keep him from drinking?"

Anne answered sadly and plainly:

"I have no influence over him. The terms we are living on here—"

Mr. Speedwell considerately stopped her.

"I understand," he said. "I will see his brother on my way home." He looked for a moment at Anne. "You are far from well yourself, he resumed. "Can I do any thing for you?"

"While I am living my present life, Mr. Speedwell, not even your skill can help me."

The surgeon took his leave. Anne hurried back, up stairs, before anybody could enter the cottage. To see the man who had laid her on the bed during the previous night, and who had looked furtively at her out of his eyes—at the moment when sentence of death had been pronounced on her—was an ordeal which she felt every finer instinct in her nature shrunk in horror.

Early by hour, the morning wore on, and he made no attempt to communicate with her. Geoffrey was evidently keeping himself secluded. The servant came up stairs to say goodby; and went away for the holiday. Shortly afterward, certain sounds reached Anne's ears from the opposite side of the house. She heard the strokes of the hammer, and then a noise as of some heavy piece of furniture being moved. The mysterious repairs were apparently being begun in the spare room.

She went to the window. The hour was approaching at which Sir Patrick's visit to Anne might be expected to make the attempt to see her.

For the third time, she looked at the letter.

It suggested, on this occasion, a new consideration to her mind. The interference which Sir Patrick had taken in secret indicate alarm as well as sympathy? Did he believe she was in a position in which the protection of the law was powerless to reach her? It seemed just possible. Suppose she was right in her conjecture—true, and to won to him (if words could express it) the vague presentiment of danger which was then present in her mind? Suppose she had to produce to satisfy the mind of a stranger? The proofs were all in her husband's favor. Witnesses could testify to the incriminating words which he had spoken to her in their presence. The presence of her self-accuser in the cottage dead that he had preferred to sacrifice his own pecuniary interests rather than consent to part with her. She could not even appeal to him on the plea of her own innocence, for interfering between herself and the man who had married her. She could not produce to satisfy the mind of a stranger? MISS GARRETT BEFORE THE BOARD OF MEDICAL EXAMINERS AT PARIS.—[SEE PAGE 478.]

MISS GARRETT.

THE lioness of the week, says a French journal of June 25, is Miss GARRETT, Doctor of Medicine of the faculty of Paris. This young lady is an American. According to the same authority she speaks French with a more than piquant accent and extraordinary facility. Met at every step with opposition from the Minister of Public Instruction and the Medical Faculty, she persisted with feminine energy, and at last presented herself, on the conclusion of her studies, for examination. She chose as the subject of her thesis, "Morgin, its causes and the means of cure." She was dressed, as the illustration of the article on page 477 will show, in a student's robe. Her family and many spectators were present, drawn by interest as well as curiosity. The examination was long, thorough, and strictly impartial, the doctors assuming to forget the sex of the candidate; but she passed through it triumphantly, and at the close was awarded the well-earned diploma.

THE FOURTH AT WOODSTOCK.

THE celebration of our National Anniversary held at the town of Woodstock, Connecticut, this year derived unusual interest from the attendance of President GRANT, General SHERMAN, the Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER, General WOODBURY, and other notable public men, whose presence drew together a large number of people from New York and the New England States. We give on page 477 an illustration of the pavilion where the addresses were made.

LITTLE DAME TROT.

WE were very young, Dick and I, and he was dreadfully poor in his sure; but then so he had nobody but me who cared particularly about him, and I thought that rent ought economize Aunt Becky to live with, why, we thought we might as well work together as wait till we were pray before we ventured to marry.

Nevertheless, it was with very shaky knees and very chilly hands, squeezed tightly together in a nervous fashion, that I slipped into Aunt Becky's room, where she sat by the fire knitting at those everlasting blue woolen stockings, and, stumbled out, "Aunt Becky, Dick and I have been talking over our prospects"—and then stopped short.

"Humph!" said my aunt, and twitched her spectacles angrily.

"And we think—that is, Dick thinks—we may as well be married now as wait."

"Ha!" said my aunt; and I felt rather encouraged by my stunning announcement.

This was not encouraging. I kicked my slippers on the hearth-rug, twisted the ring poor Ring Dick had given me round and round on my finger, then took courage, and blushed out,

"And, aunt, you know I must have some clothes; and, if you please, I should like the husband dollars that Dame Trot left me, though don't think us foolish, aunt. We—we love each other very much."

"Oh, make fools of yourselves, if you choose," returned my aunt. "It's all one to me. Only don't come bothering and begging to me afterward, that's all."

I fumed with indignation. The idea of Dick begging! However, poor old soul, I don't suppose she ever had a lover, or was in love herself, she knew nothing of my exalted sentiments—I feel I can afford to be magnanimous! Mean-while Aunt Becky slowly rose, unlocked the big shining mahogany bureau, and took out of a pigeon-hole a little soiled chamois-leather bag.

"Here, child," she said. "Don't spend it in foolish finery."

"Oh, aunt, how good of you! Thank you a thousand times. Indeed, I will spend it sensibly, Indeed!"

The old lady was not altogether hard-hearted, after all. "You've been a good girl, Margaret," she said, slowly. "I hope you'll get along well. There's a lot of poverty and misery. When poverty comes in at the door, love flies out at the window." But Richard Dalton's face was a study, as he puts me in mind of—" Here my aunt stopped abruptly, and locked up the desk with a loud snap; then resuming her knitting in her usual manner at the same time, she added, "There, there don't cry, child, about bothering me. You've made me drop six stitches already."

I spent fifty dollars; it was the "good old times," reader, long before the war, and it was only to be a poor young architect's wife, you know; and hid the other precious fifty for a rainy day.

"I hope you won't mind it's being a queer place to take a baby," said Dick to me, a little anxiously, as arm in arm we walked to the down-town church that grey June morning.

"Oh no, Dick; if you don't mind I don't," I said, hopefully, looking up—a long way up—into his face, for I am only a blue-eyed specimen of a woman, and Dick full six feet high.

"There happened to be these two vacant rooms back of the office, and the church-yard is very green and cheerful, so I thought you wouldn't mind if I took them just as a beginning. I was afraid you will laugh at my 'grande appartement en famille,' but I know you can make it cheerful, Dame Trot."

"I don't believe your furnishing will be one bit queerer than my housekeeping. We are both greenhorns—that's one comfort."

"We shan't be much troubled with company, at all events;" said Dick, laughing. "Our swell acquaintances won't bestir themselves very often, I fancy, to climb up to the fourth floor of St. Thomas's Buildings for a morning call. But you'd rather live so, wouldn't you, than in a stuffy boarding-house?" And Dick's handsome face expressed intense disgust.

At this moment, however, the church was reached. Morning prayers were just over; the few piously disposed individuals who had strayed in were coming out, the white-robed choristers had disappeared within the sacristy, and the clergyman was following. A verger stepped quietly up and whispered something in his ear; he paused, turned, and came back to the communion-rail. A few sight-seeing country people, and a little ragged news-boy peering round the pew nearest the door, were the only witnesses to the ceremony. We knelt, the service for the dead was done, and I walked out of church—Dick's wife! Was I dreaming? Was this the answer to a rake singularly little notice of such a remarkable event.

St. Thomas's Buildings, as all the world knows, stand not a stone's-throw from the church where Shepperd Dives performed, in such a most masterful way, into Mrs. Richard Dalton. I mounted breathlessly up four flights of an iron stairway, in walks deserved every stone passed upon me, to gain pertaining to the occupants of the numerous offices, and paused, panting, on the topmost floor, before a shabby little door, half ground glass, on which was inscribed the legend, "R. Dalton, Architect." We entered; a large drawing-board screen stood at a short distance within, concealing the office beyond, and forming a sort of outer apartment.

There was no carpet; but the floor was waxed and polished in the French fashion. The walls were painted pale green, with a bright, quaint border of many colors here and there twined round by a scroll inscribed with a text in medieval letters. A round table stood in the centre covered with green baize, on which were some brass lamp and a tiny vase full of violets; scattered about the room were a few chairs, roughly seated, green-framed. Plants bloomed in the open window, through which the sun came streaming, and altogether gave one the idea of study and spire of the church, and the waving boughs of trees, of which many were visible, combined to give a cheerful, but subdued, and quiet effect.

"Do you like it, Dame Trot?" asks Dick, bending his stately head very near mine.

"Like it! I think Aunt Becky never was any room so charming. And I know you'll have orders, decorations and made that killing screen—cost you nothing."

"Yes; we 'keeps a painter,'" says Dick, laughing; "but he can only work off-hours, unluckily.

"Then that was what made you so late every evening last week, was it?" I said, and then paused you of neglecting me, when all the time you were working for me! Oh!" and I hid my face in his rough coat, crying on your journey through the golden Indian Summer weather.

"Why, Dame Trot, what's this?" and unfastening the cravat, Dick threw back his collar and took singularly little notice of such a remarkable event.

Tastefully exquisite painted designs, stood on a carved walnut bracket; a rack of open shelves held a bookcase, and a little door in one side and sink were marked by a second screen, covered with yellow paper, on which some artist had left a scroll and leaf work; through its many lines grotesque monsters peered and writhed themselves. A chromo in gilt frame hung over some saintly, glowing scene in Italy, and a few of Dick's designs were pinned carelessly round. Through a door beyond a bedchamber was visible, shining, spotless, and still.

"Do you like it, Dame Trot?" asks Dick, bending his stately head very near mine.

"Like it! I think Aunt Becky never was any room so charming. And I know your orders, and decorations and made that killing screen—cost you nothing."

"Yes; we 'keeps a painter,'" says Dick, laughing; "but he can only work off-hours, unluckily.

"Then that was what made you so late every evening last week, was it?" I said, and then paused you of neglecting me, when all the time you were working for me! Oh!" and I hid my face in his rough coat, crying on your journey through the golden Indian Summer weather.

"Why, Dame Trot, what's this?" and unfastening the cravat, Dick threw back his collar and took singularly little notice of such a remarkable event.

"Horrid, of course! I had a serious idea of breaking off the engagement in consequence. Well, Dick, I'm glad you've got a lover in your nest a while, and go to work. I'll come for you by-and-by, and we'll go and have a little exploration of dining out to-day. To-morrow we must begin to forage for ourselves, Dame Trot." And nodding most kindly over his mantle, the young eyes looking lovingly into mine, my husband left me.

I don't know why or wherefore, but my first proceeding thereafter was to sit down and enjoy a good, steady, old-fashioned cry—crying from which, refreshed like Dr. Watts's rose after the shower, I betook myself to the task of arranging my whole wardrobe, which Dick had had sent from Aunt Becky's the day before. I took off my grey cotton bonnet and blue flannel gown, the pale grey silk, my best, and my wedding-dress, and folded neatly and carefully in the closet; it seemed like taking leave of them at home, that first betrothal of my garments. Then, with a great little cry of joy, I thought, "I'll think it should be true, and I am your wife!" I go about work singing gayly as a lark.

"the melody of a heart content.

"Dame Trot," said Dick to me one evening late in November, "I will go and enter for this competition at Philadelphia. It would be a thousand pities, as my pocket, to begin with, if my designs are accepted, for the decorations of the building besides, to say nothing of other work following it."

"What is it, old man?" I asked, resting my chin on his shoulder as he sat, leaning on the table.

"Why, this; don't you see?" pointing to a circular letter he had received, inviting architects to furnish plans for a certain public building.

"Well, why don't you go in? Of course you can cut the other old stupids out in a minute," I said, confidently.

"I have no objection to try and accomplish that desirable end, certainly; but how the dickens are we to live in the mean time?" It will be six weeks' hard work to get out the plans, and I shan't be making a cent; and I've just twenty-five dollars in the world at present." And Dick crammed his hands into both pockets with a long and dubious whistle.

"How lucky I resisted that black silk last June!" I thought, and slyly unfastening from the corner of my dress, where I had kept it pinned all this time for safety, the little chamois bag, I held it demurely before his eyes, saying, "Small change for current expenses, I suppose."

"Why, Dame Trot, what's this?" and unfastening the cravat, his shining eagles are poured out on the table. Fifty dollars!" "Where did you get it?"

"Inquired it, of course; don't you know I'm a fairy?"

"No—but seriously."

I curled my arms about his neck, and told him the story of poor father's little legacy, and how I had laid it by for my some good use.

"Oh my pet! my darling! All your money that you have saved so long! I can't take it from you, little birdie."

"Nonsense! I saved it for you. Besides, I consider it a very good speculation, to make a thousand dollars out of fifty."

"But if I miss the competition?"

"You won't lose it. I know you will win it for me, Dick, because—" and here, with a blushing face and the manly, fearless gaze of a wife, I whisper in his ear something which makes him start, and his brown eyes flash with joy and triumph. Then he takes me very closely to his heart, saying, in a low, broken voice—half pain, half rapture—"Oh, my God! bless my darling! God keep her, and"—a long, silent kiss finishes the sentence.

I think we both worked over those drawings. Day after day, for a long six weeks, when housework was done, I sat at my chair beside Dick, and sat perched there with my feet on the rung, after the fashion of little people, watching him, and praying for his success; an line upon line, first rough sketch, then careful elevation, perspective drawing, elaborately worked up and colored, emerged from under his steady, practiced hand. I'm sure he couldn't have thought harder or more over those famous plans than I did.

Then came a week—two weeks—of breathless suspense, for me at least; and then, one joyless afternoon, my husband returned, looking ravishingly haggard and anxious, came flying up stairs and burst the sitting-room, waving a slip of paper, and shouting "Hooray!" like any school-boy.

"Huzza, with all my heart!" I cried, laughing at his excitement. "What's up?"

"Read that, just!" and the slip of paper was tossed to me. I looked—it was a telegram from Philadelphia:

"Your design is accepted. The committee will wrote you to-morrow to come on. Congratulate you, old boy!" It was signed by an old friend of my husband's, of whom he had often spoken.

"Oh, let us be joyful!" sang I; and, catching Dick's hand, I dragged him in a wild carnagade about the sitting-room, and stopped at last breathless with laughter and singing.

"What's up, my darling, though!" said Dick, exultingly. "It shall be your wedding present, Dame Trot!" Then looking pale, my darling; the change will do you good. Come, what do you say to drying out? This ought to be a real-lete day, for I've got a thousand dollars. She has been so wonderfully helpful—such a good, little wife."

We went. In three days we had locked up our new house in dingy St. Thomas's Buildings, and started joyfully on our journey through the

The great building was founded; its massive walls began slowly to rise from the ground. As Dick had predicted, other business quickly followed upon the success of his noble birdie. The case in this world; and now a new spirit began to show itself in my ever-gay companion. He had always been industrious, now he burst to his work with savage energy; he spared hardly an hour in which to take his meals; he sat up working till two or three o'clock in the morning—long after he had sent me to bed. The more work he had, the more he sought after—eagerly, hungrily. He no longer whistled and sang over his drawing, as did formerly, but worked himself any rest on the week-days, and all day Sunday, he would be apparently quite exhausted on the very pretty cottage we had added to our small furniture, his eyes closed, and his face very pale.

"Don't work so hard, my darling," I said to him one winter evening, when, quite worn out, he had fallen asleep over dinner, after dinner, and as he often did now, begged me to turn the light out as soon possible. "Why should we be in such haste to get rich? I would rather a thousand time live in my 'airy parlor' ten years to come than have you wasted our like this. And I am sure you will injure your eyes with so much fine drawing."

"Who told you any thing ailed my eyes?" he asked, hastily, almost angrily.

"Why, you—only the light seems to trouble you."

"Nonsense, Dame Trot! Don't have such ridiculous fancies. You ought to cheer me up when I am working so hard—not discourage me with doleful ideas."

"I did not mean to discourage you, Dick; please don't think so."

"Then why do you talk in that way?" he retorted, capriciously; then, seeing that I could not keep back my tears, he put his arm around me, saying, fondly, "There—don't cry, my darling. I'm afraid I am often cross and stupid nowadays; but you know what we hope the summer will bring us, and I feel as though I ought to strain every nerve to get the means of making my darling comfortable in her great trial."

"Your eyes are more to you—and me—than any thing else," I whispered. "I'd rather go to St. Luke's than your sight should be injured."

"Nonsense—don't talk so, birdie," Dick said, with a little nervous shudder. "Besides, there is nothing the matter with my eyes. They smart and feel queer of evenings, to be sure; but that's nothing: a good night's rest makes them all right. Come—take the Builder and read to me a while—sufficient for the day," you know—that's horror reading. Dame Trot."

His words only half reassured me; but I did as he bid me, with a secret prayer that no harm might come to my brave darling who loved me so well.

The long winter months slowly dragged themselves out. Spring came, soft and balmy, with crocuses and violets in her hands, and midsummer, all golden and golden, smiled over all the land. On my breast lay a wee white daisy—Baby Margaret; but I was still in my lofty chamber, and Dick was—blind.

Yes—God help us! the blow had fallen. Shall I ever forget his awful shriek as he staggered in from his office and threw himself on his knees beside my bed, gasping out, "Margaret! oh, my poor darling! my punishment has come! I have been stricken all in a moment. My God! I had been stricken all in a moment. My God! I had almost become of us?"

Aunt Becky rose from her seat beside me. The old lady had softened wonderfully since the first beard of the new hope that had come to us. She was a most convenient visitor and helper of late, and was now my tender, faithful nurse.

"Children!" she said, "this is a terrible dispensation—terrible indeed. You must feel it almost unbearable just now; but pray—pray if you can for patience. Give me the baby, Margaret. You ought to be alone with your husband, and I must go for help directly. It may not be too late."

She took the sleeping child from my arms, wrapped in her flannel blankets (I have reserved that she left her in the care of the janitor's wife), and disappeared from the room. Then my poor, poor husband—my strong man who was the joy of the best beside me, and we just cried in company and held my hand.

"You will recover from this first attack, Mr. Dalton," said the calm, kindly voice of the ophthalmic surgeon, after a long and painful examination.

"Thank God!" spoke Dick, bending his head.

"But it will not do to risk a second. You must not venture to use your eyes for a year to come at least. Total rest is necessary."

"But, Doctor—good heavens! My wife—my child! How can I leave work for a year? I have no resources save than my professional income."

"Have you no friends who would assist you? If you wish to recover your sight you should not only give up work, but it would even be better for you to go to some way-shire—to change, air."

"Impossible!"

There was a momentary silence. Then dear old Aunt Becky, brushing away the tears that had gathered beneath her spectacles, took Dick's poor white, shaking hand in her brown wrinkled one.

"Richard," she said, "I am an old woman now. I have nothing to live for but to make you young folks happy. I've been saving up a little money these years, and it comes to a tidy little sum now. Will you take it from your cross, crabbed old aunty, and go on this journey? Margaret and baby shall be safe with me till you come home. Will you, my dear?"

I don't know what he did, but certainly either Richard hugged my aunt, and gave her a sounding kiss, or Dr. Blount did. I think, upon the whole, that it was Richard. I lying on my sofa, to which I had been promoted for the first time, could only sob out, "God bless you, from my heart, I pray, dear, dear Aunt Becky!"

A month afterward Dick went. It was a hard struggle parting from my bonny darling for that long voyage, that longer absence in a foreign land; there was no help for it, and we paused him to do more than just glance at objects through the strange blue spectacles they put over his unfortunate eyes. Baby Richard and I went to my aunt's old-fashioned house—unchanged since I left it to be a wife. The clear little room in St. Thomas's Buildings were closed and locked, the offices let to an architectural friend of my husband. How happy I was when the first letter came, after three months! Only a few lines, but enough to show that the dear eyes were better. How I longed and ached for my darling when the time drew near for his return! Aunt Becky and I and the two children should behold the steamer—rushing down to the office in the most unreasonable way, to know if there had been a telegram, long before there was any possibility of such an event! And when the summer-day was at its height once more, and Becky plotted safely into the harbor; and through the golden sunset and the golden hours, as during many a time two years ago, came my Richard, restored, thank God! to perfection of sight and health.

We are rich people now. Our house stands stately among the homes of the wealthy of the land. Its rooms are filled with every luxury that sense could demand or artistic taste require; but on an upper floor is a little room that is dearer to us than all the rest besides. No carpet, no curtains, nothing, indeed, but a cane chair, with one tiny, shabby green couch among it; a brass lamp stands on the green-covered table; a few books and papers lie about the mantle, over a quaint screen of Gothic design beneath. And here, in the soft twilight, often come the master and mistress of the mansion. There is sound of children's voices below. The glittering lights and festal, flower-crowned table seem to tell that a brilliant dinner-party is soon to begin. But Richard lingers yet; and putting his arm around the "blue-eyed marvel of a woman" beside him, he whispers: "I am happy now. God has given me all I could have asked; but I never can be happier than when I first brought home my darling wife—my own precious Little Dame Trot!"

A COMPLEXION FRESH AND SPOTLESS.

This important element of beauty depends upon the condition of the blood, and the vigor with which it circulates. If the vital fluid, meandering through the small veins which ramify immediately under the cuticle, is of a rich red color, and flows freely under the usual transparent exterior, the complexion will be rosy, pure, and brilliant. STAFFORD'S IRON AND SULPHUR POWDERS, by toning the circulating vessels, and depriving the blood of any impurities it may contain, soon remove pimples, blotches, and every species of discoloration or eruption from the face, arms, bosom, or any part of the body, and render the complexion as free from impurities as a cloudless sky.

Sold by druggists. 1 Package, 12 Powders, $1; 3 Packages, $2 50. Mailed free. Money sent at our risk.—HALL & RUCKEL, 218 Greenwich Street, N. Y.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

The Subscriber, having located his Subscription-Book Publishing House in the office of HARPER & BROTHERS, is now prepared to offer better inducements, it is believed, than any publisher of subscription-books. The works for which his Agents are now canvassing are the following:

M'CLINTOCK & STRONG'S CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE. A work adapted to the wants of all classes, being a library in itself.

WOMAN'S RECORD; or, Biographical Sketches of Distinguished Women. By Mrs. SARAH J. HALE. With more than 300 Portraits. The latest that is now evidenced in the public mind in regard to the rights, duties, and privileges of women will commend this work to the liberal patronage of both sexes.

THE LAND AND THE BOOK; or, Biblical Illustrations drawn from the Manners and Customs, the Scenery, and the Climate of the Holy Land. By W. M. THOMSON, D.D., Twenty-five Years a Missionary in Syria and Palestine. With two elaborate Maps of Palestine, an accurate Plan of Jerusalem, and several hundred Engravings.

JESUS OF NAZARETH: His Life and Teachings, illustrated by Notices of the Manners, Customs, Religious Beliefs, and Political Institutions of his Times. A household book for every Christian family.

The above are all beautifully illustrated; and, being works of the highest merit, Agents may feel assured that in offering them for sale they are conferring a favor to the public and benefiting themselves.

Persons now in the business or desiring to engage in it, and wanting business, will address, for full particulars,

A REPOSITORY OF

FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most rapid and wonderful ever known in the annals of journalism, and is recognized as the best and most attractive family paper ever issued. As an historical chronicle of Fashion it is without a rival in this country. By a special arrangement, involving great expense, with the publishers of the Berlin Bazar—the leading journal of fashion in Europe—fashion-plates are published in New York simultaneously with their appearance in Berlin and Paris.

A large portion of the BAZAR is every week devoted to practical and useful household matters. Stories, Stories, Poems, Biographical Sketches, and Gossip. The Literary Notices of the BAZAR are full, and upon the topic of social interest. No effort and no expense will be spared to permanently secure for this journal the victory which it has won so rapidly, and which it so well deserves.

Our paper Patterns of the beautiful Paris Costumes in HARPER'S BAZAR, outside the regular Supplement, guided to the figure from the most reliable measure, with the names and directions for putting together printed on each separate piece of the pattern, will be sent by the Publishers prepaid by mail on receipt of Twenty-five Cents and bust measure. The same patterns cost sixty cents to gold in Paris. Seventeen Patterns, with Illustrations, have already been furnished, and are supplied at the usual discount. In ordering, please specify the number of Bazar containing the pattern and bust measure.

In the BAZAR for April 16 was commenced "The Coquettes," a serial story by the author of "Hearts," by the Author of "Cord and Creese," "The Dodge Club," &c., profusely illustrated.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and commentary upon, all the important events of the time. Due attention is also given to topics of especial and local interest. The best artists in the country are constantly engaged in the department of illustration, and the Editorial articles are also largely indebted to photographers in all the large cities of America, Europe, and the East for prompt and valuable contributions.

As a LITERARY JOURNAL, HARPER'S WEEKLY is recognized as one of the most successful efforts ever succeeded in establishing and maintaining a high-class publication.

The Serial Stories of HARPER'S WEEKLY constitutes one of its most prominent features: It includes the productions of Charles Reade, Wilkie Collins, Mrs. Gaskell, Miss Mulock, Sheridan Le Fanu, Charles Lever, Mrs. Edmund Phillips, Mrs. Annie Edwardes, Mrs. Oliphant, Mrs. Lucas, Mrs. Henry Wood

THE ROYAL FAMILY OF PRUSSIA.

THE beginning of a war between France and Prussia, in which the whole of Germany, if not the whole of Europe, may become involved, again brings the principal personages of the royal family of Prussia prominently before the public; and we therefore lay accurate portraits of them before our readers.

The King, WILLIAM I., was born in 1797, and was the second son of FREDERICK WILLIAM III. When his elder brother, King FREDERICK WILLIAM IV.—a most amiable but weak-minded man—became insane, in 1858, WILLIAM, then commander-in-chief of the PRUSSIAN ARMY, was declared Regent. His first act was to dismiss the cabinet of his elder brother, composed entirely of leaders of the aristocratic party, and to establish a new administration, to whose energetic and liberal policy the kingdom owes much of its material and political advancement. His insane brother died in 1861, without issue, and the Regent became King, under the title of WILLIAM I. The great events of his reign thus far have been the annexation of the Elbe duchies and the important campaign which ended in the humiliation of AUSTRIA. A proud, headstrong monarch, and a firm believer in the divine right of kings, he only tolerates constitutional government because he can not help himself, and his rule is as nearly despotic as a strong will can make it.

His Queen, AUGUSTA, is the daughter of the Grand Duke of Weimar. She is a very ambitious woman, fine-looking, and is said to be personally very kind and amiable.

The only son, and the heir to the throne, is the Crown Prince, FREDERICK WILLIAM, who is represented standing on the left of the King. He should not be confounded with his cousin, the Prince Royal, FREDERICK CHARLES, who is represented on the other side of the engraving—an error which is sometimes made by American writers, owing probably to the incidents of name and title, and to the fact that each commanded a corps of the army in the campaign of Sadowa, and that both were equally gallant and distinguished on that bloody field. The Crown Prince was born in 1831. Just before his father's elevation to the throne he married the eldest daughter of Queen VICTORIA. His wife and their second child, Princess CHARLOTTE, are represented by the side of the Crown Prince. The eldest child of the young couple, Prince FREDERICK WILLIAM (the sixth of the name), is represented at the feet of his grandparents.

The Prince Royal, FREDERICK CHARLES, the nephew of the King, is commander of a corps of the Prussian army. He was born in 1828. King WILLIAM is fortunate in having in his own family two commanders of such pre-eminent ability as the Crown Prince and the Prince Royal.

The Grand Duke of Baden, Prince FREDERICK, is a son-in-law of the King of Prussia, having married, in 1856, the only daughter of that monarch, Princess LOUISA MARY, who is represented at his side.

Prince Frederick Charles. Queen Augusta. Grand Duchess of Baden. Prince Frederick William. Grand Duke of Baden. King William I. Prince Frederick William. Princess Victoria. Princess Charlotte.

THE POLITICAL SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

WE have more than once stated that one of the gravest objections to the ascendency of the Democratic party is, that it has not acquiesced in the results of the war. As its principle of State sovereignty justified the rebellion, so the same principle denies the validity of the measures of reconstruction. And as the chief necessity of the country is repose and relief from the spirit which sought its destruction, and which it has vanquished, it is not justly the disposition to cherish and develop that spirit, which is the disposition of the Democratic party. It is because this is so plainly and notwithstanding a certain dissatisfaction with the Republicans, there is a profound distrust of the Democrats, and a real reluctance to intrust them with power. Whatever difference there may be between the tone of a party press in opposition, and the policy of the same party in administration—however true it may be that the measures of a government will be very unlike the resolutions of a convention, there is yet no doubt that the intelligent people of the United States would see with the utmost apprehension the party that virtually consented to the destruction of the government seven years ago now in control of the government.

Nor ought any good citizen to fail to observe the signs of the times. At this moment the Democratic leaders believe the Republican party to be hopelessly demoralized. The recent outbreak upon the electoral vote of New York, by means of the system of fraud which they have perfected, and the objectors to which, in their own party, they have effectually silenced. They see the elections every where favorable to them, and they have no doubt that the division among Republicans will deepen and widen during the next two years. Their reasoning is simple, and the grounds of it are obvious. Success, indeed, seems to them so sure that they do not think it necessary to conceal their confidence nor their opinions. As a party they are not prepared to equivocate in the great measures of reconstruction. They consider nothing settled, and they will not hesitate to repeat every question that the legislation of the last five years has concluded. Even the later Amendments to the Constitution they repudiate. The gap which pallisaded the armed rebellion of defeated voters, which, during the war, counseled submission to it, and which, since the war, has concealed its preference of rebels to loyal citizens, greedily seizes every opportunity to denounce the policy of reconstruction as a policy of tyranny, and nominates its judges to the highest court in the largest State with the declared expectation that they may be called upon to array the State against the Union.

The Democrats of Kentucky refuse to consider the question of equal suffrage settled. Those of a county in Ohio proclaim the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment a shameless mockery, and reaffirm that this is a white man's government. And Mr. FERRIS, a Republican Representative in Congress from New York, brings all the Democratic members of his House to book by a resolution that the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments have been duly ratified and are a part of the Constitution, to which all the Democratic members vote no. It is true that the Democratic majority in the New York Legislature substantially recognized the Amendments. But the national representatives of their party decline to do so. It is true, also, that certain Democratic members of Congress recommended that certain questions be regarded by the party as dead issues; but the vote of the same members in the House shows that they do not consider the validity of the Amendments among the settled questions. The World, indeed, sneers at the Kentucky members of its party as "hide-bound." But the value of the World as a representative and influential party organ may be readily estimated. It preferred Mr. CHASE as a Presidential candidate in 1864, and Mr. SEYMOUR was nominated. It opposed any repudiating tone in the platform, and it was made to favor virtual repudiation. It called upon Governor HOFFMAN to withdraw, and its party cursed it. It denounced the Ring in New York, and the Ring put it in its pocket. The Ring may be worse than its party, but it does not in the least influence the party policy. Its breaches of discipline are remembered against it, and its suggestions are received with suspicion by the real party managers.

If the Democratic party in 1868, when the Republicans were firmly united by opposition to the mischievous purposes of ANDREW JOHNSON, and by enthusiasm for the hero of the war, General GRANT, did not hesitate to place itself under the leadership of WADE HAMPTON, and to declare for repudiation, how little likely is it to shrink, should it be successful in 1872, from undoing every thing that has been done, and from opening every vexed question? It can not be too often urged upon the voters of this country that the Democratic party for many a year has been directed by its most unscrupulous managers. Its policy was the extension of slavery. Its masters were, therefore, the great slave politicians of the Southern States; and their ends could be accomplished only by encouraging the very worst passions of human nature. Slavery is gone, with many of the politicians who served it. But the ignorance and demoralization of the party remain, and it has such managers as such elements require and imply. Having no statesmen for leaders, it has no ability to adapt a party to a new policy. The most positive element in the party to-day is hatred of the negro and sympathy with the rebel doctrine and spirit. As a party, it was Copperhead during the war, and it is Copperhead still. Should it carry the country at the next election, it would plunge us into a confusion of which it is impossible to foresee the end.

Congress has failed to apprehend this fact. The Republican majority has not seen the vital necessity of party union. When Congress adjourned the country should have been able to see at a glance the Republican platform. That platform should have been a firm adherence to the settlement of the Union; a vigorous system of defense for the purity of the polls; a palpable reduction of taxation; a wise and liberal spread of the currency; a foreign policy vigorously maintaining our just rights, honorable to our laws and treaties, and consistent with liberties and peace, and there is time enough fully to comprehend the situation and to secure the future. The Republicans of Congress the plain House, but they will not lose a majority. They will easily retain that majority if they nominate men who stand for such principles, and who have the courage of their opinions. They can not, however, select a single issue and think to succeed upon that, as to subsist upon universal excitement and able men, who have decided views upon maintaining the national settlement, upon reducing taxation, upon improving the public service, and who are wise to comprehend what is called the necessity of the case, which implies concession and conciliation to the most dangerous hostility, are the men whom the Republicans should nominate and elect; and these are the men who would make Republican success as sure in 1872 as it was in 1868.

THE WAR IN EUROPE.

WHEN PRINCE LEOPOLD, wisely for himself, consented to withdraw from the candidature for the Spanish crown, it was hoped that the Emperor of France would be satisfied with this decisive step, and would refrain from any further act of the King of Prussia, and allow the peace of Europe to remain undisturbed; but it is now evident that the last step was the first, and that the war was only too ready to seize upon any pretext for a quarrel. He was not inclined to be nice about pretexts. From the moment that he found himself out of the way, the French Minister at the court of Berlin provokes an insult from the King of Prussia. The King of Prussia refuses to be an insult, and that is sufficient for his imperial master. Forthwith all France is in a blaze. War against Prussia is the cry of the French legislative body and by the Emperor, and the immense armies of France are set in motion toward the Rhine.

To the French Emperor war with Prussia was, perhaps, a political necessity. He had been overwhelmed too long by BISMARCK, the astute and able statesman who suddenly emerged from comparative obscurity, a few years since, and did, at one blow, what LOUIS NAPOLEON had vainly tried to do—freed Italy and humbled Austria. BISMARCK likewise reorganized Germany, while LOUIS NAPOLEON was comparatively humiliated in Mexico; and while the presence of France was under the Emperor, the Prussian Minister gave him the mortification of LOUIS NAPOLEON has, of course, felt what all the world has seen—his waning political reputation.

Some decisive and, if possible, splendid blow, either of conquest or of glory, was necessary to cover his position; and as the chance was suddenly presented of fighting Prussia and pushing armies to the Rhine, he luckily found the national pride seconding his individual desire, so that the declaration of the French Foreign Minister, that France would not permit a German prince to sit upon the throne of CHARLES V., was echoed by the nation, which saw all the possibilities. And as he found France universally ready for war, he did not hesitate to seize upon a flimsy and transparent pretext to precipitate a conflict which may involve several other nations, and work as many and as important changes in the map of Europe as did the wonderful Seven Days' campaign against Austria. The military position of the two nations is not unequal. Both have been preparing for this conflict for more than a score of years. There can be no question as to the military strength of Prussia. Her army in the field amounts to nearly 800,000 men, led by some of the ablest generals of the day; and her National Guard, organized in response to the mobilization of the Prussian Landwehr, adds more than half a million of fighters, soon to this colossal force. On the other hand, the military condition of the victors of Sadowa is not less perfect than that of Prussia. Between the troubles in Schleswig-Holstein and the question of Luxembourg, BISMARCK has never lost sight of the fact that the struggle between France and Prussia was merely an armed truce. That France should gain the coveted left bank of the Rhine is, therefore, at least doubtful. As we write a rumor comes that a Prussian "raid" upon the Eastern Railway line in the direction of the fortified city of METZ, where three hundred thousand troops are concentrating under MARSHALS BAZAINE and M'MAHON, has been crushed by the French—the first success in a struggle the end whereof no man can foresee.

In the awful conflict which the ambition of NAPOLEON has forced, and the obstinacy of another have thus forced upon Europe, American citizens may justly withhold their sympathy from both sides. No more needless war was ever begun. It involves no great principle. On neither side is it properly a war of defense. It is simply a struggle for personal power between the Emperor of France and the King of Prussia, and the main question to be decided is, which of these two potentates has the stronger army and the more skillful generals. In forcing the conflict at the present moment, NAPOLEON is certainly in the wrong; but the arrogance of King WILLIAM, and his readiness to accept the challenge which his own conduct has provoked, are proofs of provoking, and have an equal partner in the guilt of involving Europe in a needless war.

PARTY COURAGE.

THE Naturalization bill of Mr. NOAH DAVIS, which was an admirable and necessary measure, was defeated in the House, and another was finally passed which offers the opportunity of some precautions against fraud at elections. The Tribune says the new bill removes all the evils. The World says that it is a revival of the Know-Nothing crusade, and is really aimed at the exclusion of foreigners. This, of course, is nonsense. But it is precisely the kind of objection, namely, an appeal to prejudice, which the Republican party ought to have decisively met, and which defeated Mr. DAVIS's bill. Honorable members were afraid of alienating the foreign vote. But they might have spared their fears. The intelligent foreigner will always vote with those who pander to him most unscrupulously; and in that contest the Republicans will always have the best side. The intelligent foreigner, however, knows who is his friend. It is as with the new colored vote in the Southern States. The worst part of it will be lost to the Republicans. But the intelligent part will remain.

The Republican party is peculiarly the friend of the foreigner, because it maintains the great, original, and fundamental principles of the government. It is the party of free labor, free trade, free soil, free ballot, and free men. It demands the equality of all citizens before the law. It refuses to disqualify a man from voting because he is poor, or because he is of any color. It discourages all hostility of sections or classes. It insists upon the most universal education. And every where the promoters of the order, the sobriety, and the morality which are now invoked by the honest laborer are usually to be found among Republicans. Every man who knows the history of this country knows that the Democratic party was the supporter of a system which stigmatized and disgraced labor; which authorized a man to buy and sell the sinews of every trade, if they were colored; and which insisted, by one of its chief leaders and lawyers in this State, that the children of O'CONOR, that the Irish who owned blackamoths and gardeners, as if they were his cattle, should be allowed to vote. Every New York, and hold them hereby as property, side by side with the free blacksmiths and gardeners of New York.

Every man who knows our history knows that it was the perception of this degrading and un-American policy, sustained by the Democratic party, which led to the formation of the Republican party. He knows that the Republicans showed how the great Democratic leaders, being slaveholders, sought to obtain possession of the territories of the United States, so that when the free laborers from New York went there to settle he would have found the great proprietor of slave laborers his immediate rival, and his wages measured by the amount necessary to support a man kept as nearly like a brute as possible. He knows further, that the exposure of this fact aroused the great mass of intelligent Americans, who live by their own labor; that they expelled the slave party calling itself Democratic from power, and have since put down the rebellion waged by the leaders of that party in the interest of slavery, have abolished slavery, removed the stigma from labor, and passed a homestead law. These are the most familiar facts of our later political history, and these show plainly enough which party is the friend of the laboring man.

Why, then, should any Republican fear that if the same party passed the most energetic laws to protect naturalization and to purify the polls, the native intelligence would misunderstand it? While the Republican party pursued its great purposes of subduing the rebellion, and so abolishing and punishing the Know-Nothing spirit, and firmly, it was every where victorious. Courage inspires confidence. No party that is not bold is powerful; and what it becomes timid it is death-stricken. If it can be frightened from one point it can be driven from all. The grasp of the Republican party upon affairs has become a little relaxed. It does not hold them as a master, but rather as a suppliant. It is looking about and wondering whether it will be supported. While it wonders it is in danger. Let it not fear to do and to say what it heartily believes and what it wishes to do. It knows the enormous frauds at the polls. The whole country knows them. And a plain resolution that the national authority should stop these frauds would instantly bring the country closer to the party. The hostility to a proper law of naturalization, or to that to the purity of every evil in our system, which bitter experience has revealed, springs from the source of all the troubles in our history, which Republicans called "the monster" of State sovereignty.

PARTY ORTHODOXY.

IN opposing the confirmation of Mr. MURPHY as Collector of New York, Senator FENTON is reported to have laid the utmost stress upon his want of party loyalty, charged that he supported Mr. HOFFMAN for Governor in 1868. Senator CONKLING's reply to his colleague is understood to have been very severe. He tried his fellow Senator by his own test, and stated that in his own State Senatorial district, which is largely Democratic, Senator FENTON had supported an independent nomination, which secured the election of the Democratic candidate. Senator CONKLING was also aided by Mr. Evening Post's opposition to Mr. MURPHY upon similar grounds, and quoted well-known cases of "bolting" upon the part of that party, and declared that some of the free criticisms of its editor upon those with whom he differs. The report describes the speech as very caustic, and it was followed by an extraordinary unanimity of the Senate in favor of the confirmation of Mr. MURPHY.

It has the merits of this case in a single proposition to enter. But, since the arena and the character of the debate have given it a degree of general interest, it is right that Republicans elsewhere should know that in the State of New York there are no better or more consistent Republicans, no abler public men, and no more spotless citizens than Senator CONKLING and Judge FOLGER, who appeared as the especial friends of Mr. MURPHY. The bitterness of the debate was but the public proclamation of a difference that has existed for some time in the Republican party of New York, and which explains much of the apathy that has been observed in its ranks, and the untoward result of the recent elections. The consequences of the violent public rupture between the two Senators, which was sooner or later inevitable, can not be foreseen. But certainly it was not the issue sought by Senator CONKLING. He favored the confirmation of Mr. MURPHY, and his colleague opposed it. And when his colleague arraigned Mr. MURPHY at length, attacking in detail his political character and consistency, and insinuating, if not charging, personal dishonesty, there was no alternative but for Senator CONKLING to take up the gauntlet, and to come out and fight the question. His duty was now worked out by the position of the case. It was founded, but that similar political charges could be sustained against the accuser. This he did with emphasis.

This painful debate will be useful if it serves to show what an extremely dangerous weapon, as the locomotive said, a charge of party infidelity is. It is apt to recoil, because, happily, intelligent men will not surrender their convictions to party names. Here are three conspicuous Republicans—Senator FENTON, Mr. MURPHY, and Mr. GREELEY—and it appears that each of these has differed from what they esteem proper, "bolted" the regular party action. Certainly they are not the less to be respected for their independence, for a man's highest duty to his party is often the refusal to yield to its discipline; nor can any satisfactory arbitrary standard be devised to determine party fidelity. The men who boast that they have always voted "the straight ticket" are men to be suspected and watched. They are certainly not the men for public functions requiring impartiality and breadth of view. When JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, as a member was mere, was opposed to the War of 1812, was reproached with not supporting a candidate nominated by his party for the Assembly, in Westchester County, he said, for himself and those who acted with him, what may be well remembered: "We approve of the customary mode of nominating candidates, and agree to uniformly concurred in it; that concurrence certainly involved our tacit consent to be bound by the nominations which should be so made. But it is equally certain that such concurrent did, does, and ever will rest on the condition, trust, and confidence that such nominations only be made as we could or can support without transgressing the obligations we are under to preserve our characters and our minds free from hesitation and reproach. We are, and will be, faithful to the peace party; but we will also be faithful to our sense and conviction of what is decent and becoming for us to do."

A RAT DIET NOT IMMINENT.

In the reported speeches of Generals BUTLER and HAWLEY, on the Fourth of July, at Woodstock, it is not easy to see the difference of opinion which seems to have been uttered by them. General BUTLER said that the cody trade was really a slave-trade, and he was undoubtedly correct. But he distinctly said that he was not hostile to what may be called natural immigration. General HAWLEY said that he did not see how the gates of the country could be locked against foreigners. In that he, too, was unquestionably correct. But he can, of course, see how they can be opened against a slave-trade. The importation of coolies by contract is no more immigration than the importation of slaves. It is a system by which the worst classes of foreigners would be thrown into this country in the greatest numbers. It would be an unfriendly and unnecessary increase of the difficulties with which the country has to deal. We presume that General HAWLEY is no more favorable to such a system than General BUTLER; and we understand him to mean only that we ought not to oppose a normal and natural immigration from any part of the world.

The British colonial experience shows exactly what the cody trade is. It is not prosecuted for more than twenty years in the English and other colonies in the Gulf of Mexico, and the British Government has made laws for its regulation, and appointed agents for its supervision. As we stated a few weeks since, it is characterized by the strictest of the slave-trade. Kidnapping and fraud precede embarkation, and the horrors of the middle passage are common. A little more than a year ago a ship left Calcutta for Demerara with 468 coolies, and arrived with only 364 still living. The gentleman who has lived for twenty years in Jamaica said in a paper before the Anti-Slavery Conference in Paris, two years ago, that the cody trade was the most atrocious form of the slave-trade, and that, as the observer's interest in the cody is limited, he is really worse off than a slave. In Cuba they are disposed of in open market like cattle; and the parliamentary blue-book of a year or two since showed that 6,581 Chinese had been imported into Cuba within a period of twenty months. In Peru not more than 16,000 coolies are living of 100,000 imported within twenty years, and not more than 100 have returned to China.

These are the facts of the cooly contract system in small states like Cuba, Peru, and the Gulf colonies. What are likely to be the results of such a system in a country like the United States, with its opportunities and demands for labor? That demand and opportunity will bring the laborers. It is only necessary to prevent the artificial stimulus given to the movement by the contract system. The Chinese current of population began to flow toward this country in 1848. Between that year and 1868, for twenty years, the yearly average of the immigration was not quite 6000. Last year it was 12,000. That is not alarming average, and even that is artificial. This country can annually assimilate a great many more Chinese than 12,000. Let us prohibit any kind of slave-trade, and the Crispins will not fear that they will be compelled to eat rats.

THE MINORITY A PART OF THE PEOPLE.

THE new Constitution recently adopted by the State of Illinois is so full of excellent provisions that it is very likely to serve as a model for all the States that hereafter may make any fundamental law. The general applause with which it is received by the country shows also the wisdom of vigorous and radical action by the Constitutional Convention. When a system has been shown by experience to be inadequate, Hamlet's advice is the true counsel—"Out with it altogether." Undoubtedly the Constitution proposed to the State of New York by the Convention of 1867 would have been more generally approved if it had been a new instrument instead of an old one patched and darned. We do not mean, of course, that a Constitutional Convention is to seek novelty as of itself an advantage. But experience reveals in every fundamental law certain imperfections and weaknesses, unsound principles and practices, and these should be shorn away. For instance, the present Constitution of this State is unwisely jealous of appointed officers. But there are offices to which, from their very nature, it is better that men should be appointed than elected, and experience therefore proves it. But the New York Convention was afraid that it would be accused of seeking to take power from the people. That timidity was the bane of the Convention, and ruined its work. The Constitution seemed to have no friends. Even the party that controlled the Convention was unwilling to recommend its work.

The Judiciary article of the Constitution of 1867 was the weakest and most thorough in it reforms, and that was adopted. What a farce has one point like the new Illinois Constitution. It gives the minority a chance. Thus, in the late election for Judges of Appeals, under that article, although there appeared a majority of the party ninety thousand against the Republican ticket, two Republicans from the five nominated were elected. In like manner, in Illinois, it is proposed to allow cumulative voting in the elections to the lower branch of the Legislature. This is a system which secures a representation of the minority. Each Senatorial district in the State is to send three members to the Lower House, and every voter may cast his three votes at his pleasure. He may give one vote to each of three candidates, or he may give one to one candidate and two to another, or he may give all three to one. If the minority in the district is decided, it will, of course, concentrate all its votes upon one candidate, and so secure a representative. If the district be evenly divided, it is not so easy to foresee the result. Both parties would then nominate an entire ticket, and there would be the same trading that there is now. But such a system would certainly be likely to put forward its best man.

The adoption of the system, however, whether experience shall show it to be wise or unwise to its purpose than some other, or not, is a most significant fact. It marks the progress of political science. It shows that every principle in our system is to be investigated and proved. It indicates the perception that our system itself demands revision, and that while the majority may be heard, inasmuch as the system is that of the government of the people, and not a part of them, the rights of the minority are also first and rudest, but by no means the final and sure method of ascertaining the popular will. The same logic and reasoning which led the wisest of the Revolutionary fathers to perceive that slavery was a constant satire upon a government professing to derive its powers only as it sent, lead their children to see that the will of a hundred persons can not be truly expressed by fifty-one, and that the government can not endure only until a better, because more accurate, system is devised. Nothing could show more clearly the political intelligence of Illinois than its perception of the propriety of some such provision; and no political experiment could be watched with more interest by all sagacious political thinkers in the country.

"THE MUCH-MALIGNED CITY OF NEW YORK."

THE death of FLORENCE SCANNEL, and the monstrous assault of the Roman Catholic firemen upon the Protestants, on Sunday, women and children, at their late picnic upon the anniversary of the Boyne, are very significant facts.

FLORENCE SCANNEL was a young man of twenty-three and a Democratic politician. He was emphatically "a representative of the dangerous classes." And, after rioting through the streets one night in last December with a party of desperadoes like himself, he burst into a liquor shop and was shot in a drunken brawl. After lapsing paralyzed for several months he died a few days since. A great crowd of his friends met the city. The Board of Aldermen passed resolutions of respect for his memory. Municipal officers and politicians followed the dangerous classes." And, after rioting through the his funeral

NAPOLEON III.

THE latest telegrams received at the moment of writing announce that the Emperor of France will take the field in person against Prussia; and as King WILLIAM I. will probably place himself at the head of his own army, as in the campaign against Austria, the new war may present the spectacle of the crowned heads of the two greatest military powers in Europe meeting on the field of battle—not in personal combat, of course, as in the olden times, but as leaders and manœuvrers of immense armies. King WILLIAM is a trained soldier, and the Emperor NAPOLEON has approved himself an eminent strategist. He commanded the French army in person in the Italian war, which resulted in the expulsion of the Austrians; and it is admitted that the success of the campaign was largely owing to his military skill. He is now matched against a more formidable antagonist.

It is a singular fact that while the two grand divisions of the Prussian army are led by young men, under the general direction of the veteran MOLTKE, the great Marshals of France on whom the Emperor relies for the conduct of his armies are veterans in years as well as in service. The principal army operating against the Rhine is under the command of Marshal M'MAHON, who distinguished himself in the last two great wars of France, that against RUSSIA, and that against Austria—in the former of which he was the "hero of the Malakoff," and in the latter the "hero of Magenta." He is a Frenchman by birth, but descended from an ancient Irish family. For his achievement in the Austrian war he was created Duke of Magenta. He is 63 years old. Marshals CANROBERT and BAZAINE are also over 60 years of age. Marshal FOREY is 66, Marshal RANDON 75, Marshal VAILLANT 80, and Marshal CHANGARNIER, who has been placed in command of the French reserves, is 77 years old.

COUNT VON BISMARCK.

THIS energetic statesman was the right-hand man of King WILLIAM I. in the affair of the Duchies and the war with Austria. The fatigues and terrible responsibilities of the famous Seven Days' campaign which broke the military power of Austria told severely upon the strength and health of the Prussian statesman, who since that time has lived chiefly in retirement. The war with France will draw him once more to the side of his sovereign, who has never found him wanting in times of emergency. King WILLIAM will find his prompt counsel and unhesitating decision invaluable in the present contest, opposed to such a nation as France.

NAPOLEON III., EMPEROR OF FRANCE.

GENERAL LEBŒUF.

On the death of Marshal NIEL, in 1869, General LEBŒUF, commanding the Sixth Corps d'Armée, was appointed to succeed him as Minister of War; and when M. OLLIVIER reorganized the Cabinet early in the present year, General LEBŒUF was retained in that important position.

The General is said to be physically the biggest man in the French army. He was born in 1809, and entered the service through the Polytechnic School, and the École d'Application of Metz, whence he emerged a full-blown Lieutenant of artillery in 1833. His promotion was very rapid. His brilliant conduct at the engagement of the Iron Gates, in Algeria, attracted the attention of the Orleans princes, who took a leading part in that engagement, and he obtained his Captaincy in 1837. Like his predecessor, Marshal NIEL, he distinguished himself greatly in many engagements, and was rapidly promoted. In 1854 he went to the Crimea as head of the artillery staff, with the rank of Major-General, and took a prominent part in the battle of the Alma. He was appointed Lieutenant-General in 1857, and two years later the whole of the artillery of the Italian expedition was placed under his supreme command. The French say but for his timely aid in bringing up an overwhelming number of guns to bear on the Austrian right, commanded by BENEDEK, VICTOR EMANUEL'S army at Solferino would have been crushed, and the position of the French army seriously compromised. He is said to possess great administrative ability.

CHAPTER VI.

Preparations for Winter.—Seal-Hunting Again.—An Aged Patriarch.—Exciting Chase.—A Violent Storm.—Repairing Damages.—Adventure with a Sea-Lion.—A Dreadful Night.

THE Auckland summer—that is, December, January, and February—was entirely gone before the cabin was finished, and the period of short days and long evenings and nights was coming on. The days were, in fact, scarcely long enough for the work which it was necessary to perform.

The work of procuring a sufficient quantity of wood involved a great deal of labor. The wood was very difficult to cut, being not only hard, but knotty and gnarled. The axe—their only one—had become extremely dull, and there was no means of sharpening it. Then the wood had to be brought from a considerable distance over the roughest and most impracticable ways. The first thing done in the morning, commencing as soon as it was light, was to attend to this duty.

The difficulty arising from the dullness of the axe became at length so serious that Mr. Raynal found it absolutely necessary to devise some means of overcoming it. He tried for a long time in vain to find some stone on the island that would answer the purpose of sharpening a tool. At length it occurred to him that the stones used for ballast on board their vessel were masses of a kind of sandstone which might perhaps be suitable. So he went on board, and after groping about for a time, up to his middle in water, in the dark hold, and feeling with his feet in the muddy sediment which had accumulated there, he at last found a stone which seemed to be of the proper size, and he finally succeeded in getting it up and carrying it ashore.

He then contrived to manufacture a kind of "cold-chisel" out of a bolt which he obtained from the vessel; and with this and his hammer he succeeded after a while in smoothing his stone at the sides and rounding it at the edge, so as to give it the required form. The bolt through the centre gave him the greatest trouble; but he at last succeeded in overcoming this difficulty too. The grindstone thus made he contrived to mount between the trunks of two trees which grew close together near the cabin; and it served an excellent purpose in grinding the axe, and all the other tools, during the whole time of the stay of the party upon the island.

During the remainder of the day the great occupation of the men, when the weather allowed it, was making hunting expeditions after seals, the flesh of these animals being their chief reliance for food. In these excursions they met with a great variety of adventures, and were often exposed to extreme hardship and danger.

On one occasion, soon after they moved into the cabin, they took their boat, and, leaving the one whose turn it was to attend to the housekeeping at home, they set off across the bay to hunt for seals on an island which they had named Figure Eight, from its form. They found, on their arrival at a certain part of the island, a great number of young seals together, engaged like so many kittens at play. Their mothers were among them, and in the centre was a very large and apparently old seal, who had the air and appearance of an aged patriarch witnessing with pleasure the gambols of his children.

The hunters advanced cautiously and by stealth toward this group, and watched them for a moment, without allowing themselves to be seen. The old seal, besides other appearances indicating age, opened his mouth once or twice, and showed that his teeth were nearly all gone. His countenance wore that mild, gentle, intelligent, and almost human expression, so characteristic of the species. The hunters, or, at least, Mr. Raynal, felt some compunction at the thought of murderously breaking into this charming domestic scene with slaughter and death. But their own wants were imperious, and they prepared for the attack.

HUNTING SEALS.

In the mean time the old seal—they afterward named him the Royal Tom—spied them, looked alarmed, and came forward to meet them, growling in a subdued voice. The hunters immediately sprang forward, and, with their clubs, knocked down the young seals so fast as they could reach them. They killed seven. They then gave all the clubs to Harry, so as to have, each of them, except Harry, two hands free. Each of them seized two of the young seals by the tail, and ran for the boat. Harry followed, with the clubs under one arm and a seal in the hand of the other. This was done so promptly that the old seals could not move quick enough to intercept them. The men pushed the boat off from the shore, and rowed for their lives—Royal Tom and the bereaved mothers following after them, and growling and bellowing for their young.

The distress of the poor mothers was painful to witness. They followed hard after the boat, and one of them, coming up alongside, leaped out of the water in an attempt to get on board. The men were wet with the spray which her fall back into the water threw up into their faces. At last Mr. Raynal, seriously alarmed for the safety of the boat, fired at them. The report of the gun frightened them off. They gave up the chase, and returned disconsolate to the shore.

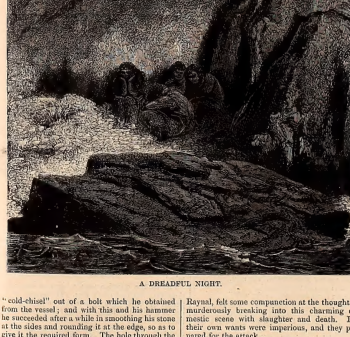
By this and some other successful expeditions they procured a store of food somewhat in advance of their wants; and, anticipating the possibility of scarcity to come, they took measures to cure and preserve a portion of their supply. They accordingly cut up the flesh of these young seals, to be packed with salt in a cask; and afterward, when they thought them sufficiently salted, suspended them to the roof of their cabin. In this way they succeeded in curing and preserving a large quantity of food.

It was necessary for them to have some supply of food in store, for the stormy season was coming on, and it was to be expected that their hunting expeditions would sometimes be interrupted by the weather. Indeed, toward the end of March, there came on a terrific storm, which lasted many days, and made it impossible for them to do any thing out of doors. The wind blew almost a hurricane, and was accompanied by terrific thunder and lightning, with storms of hail, and sometimes with deluging torrents of rain. The trees were stripped of their leaves and of many of their branches by the gale. Fortunately the cabin held its ground securely, and was not damaged.

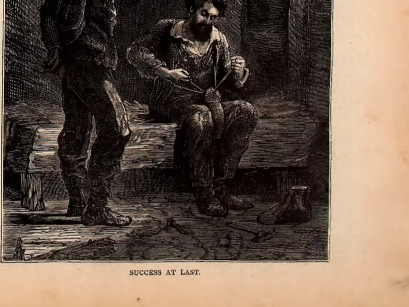
The party made an excursion in their boat, as soon as the storm subsided, to examine the signal pole, which, it will be remembered, they had set up on the shore at the entrance of the bay. They found the pole standing, but the flag had entirely disappeared. Even the bottle had been carried away. They found it at some distance from the pole, lying on the ground and half covered with leaves and rubbish.

They at once went to work to make and set up a new signal, out of materials which they had brought with them, in anticipation of the emergency. They replaced the flag with a board, which they thought they could make more secure. This board was whitened by means of a pigment made of chalk and seal oil; and Mr. Raynal had painted a large N upon it, in black, which letter was intended to denote the direction in which persons observing the signal must go to find the shipwrecked men. They fixed this signal in a new place, fastening the board between two poles set up in a place such as would bring the board in full relief against a dark background formed by the side of a mountain, and thus, as they hoped, would make it conspicuously visible from vessels in the offing.

The violence and the duration of this storm made the party feel more than ever the necessity of having a store of provisions in reserve; and accordingly, immediately after it was over, and they had returned from replacing their signal,



A DREADFUL NIGHT.



SUCCESS AT LAST.

they went again to Figure Eight in search of seals. This expedition was very successful, and the store were replenished by it for a considerable time. But as the season advanced, and the days grew shorter and the cold more severe, they often ate made long and very fatiguing excursions almost or entirely in vain. On one of these nearly fruitless expeditions they were out all night, and suffered severely. It was early in May—a month which, with them, corresponds with our November. They set out a little after noon, the early part of the day having been occupied in bringing in wood and in other similar duties. They left Harry at home, it being his turn that week to attend to the housekeeping. The other four, armed with their clubs, left the cabin together. Their destination was the isthmus which connected the two islands together, and which, being low and level, and covered with the moss which was meant to be used for clothing. After leaving them all in the house at Seal Island, they were laid upon a flat floor, prepared for the purpose, and spread out smooth, one upon the other, in a pile. Boards were then placed upon the top, and heavy stones laid upon them, to subject the skins to pressure, in order to get the water out. They were then packed into the running brook for a second washing. When they were thought to be thoroughly soaked, they were immersed in the decoction of astringent bark not to be named. It was necessary to have them here in large quantities, as there were continually, at this time, and it was found that the process was going on at least one half of the time, if not oftener, but it was very slow. After some weeks the thinner and lighter skins could be taken out for use, but at no time were the heavy ones taken out less nearly all the winter before they were completely tanned.

When at length a sufficient number of the skins suitable for shoes were ready, they were taken out of the water and laid on the floor to dry. Then came the work of making them into shoes. Here the difficulties to be overcome in this undertaking were numerous, and some of them very embarrassing. First an awl was required. This was made by taking a needle and fixing a handle to hard wood. Then thread, to serve for "waxed ends." These were manufactured by the hemp of seal-cloth unraveled and twisted into threads of the right size, and tipped with bristles for the purpose of waxing. Last of all, there was the whole party were occupied several evenings in making candles, by saving out bacon fat, and, with the proper size, by means of a saw made of an iron hoop, and then splitting the blocks up into strips. Cutting the lasts for the shoes might seem a matter of great difficulty. On the first trial, after a mold had been formed over the foot, the last could not be got out, and Mr. Raynal was obliged to rip his work open again to release it. But Raynal made his foot first over in soft wax, with a wedge between, so that when the shoe was finished he could first withdraw the wedge, and then the other two pieces could be easily removed.

At length, however, all the difficulties were surmounted, and Mr. Raynal succeeded in finishing an excellent pair of shoes. The others, having watched the progress of the work, followed his example, and in a short time they were all provided with somewhat rude but very effectual, means of protection for their feet.

The shoemaking was succeeded by tailoring—the skins of the young seals from the hair still upon them, being employed as the material for making the clothes.

CHAPTER THE FIFTH.—RUTH.

THE SIGNS OF THE END.

THERE was a supply of water to the cottage, on the upper floor. The bedroom jugs and cans, usually in their places at an earlier hour, were standing that night at the cistern. An empty pail was left near them. Directing the lad to bring his own supply of provisions, Geoffrey tore down the curtains in a flaming heap, putty on the bed and the bedding, and set it. Using the can and the pail alternately, as the boy brought them, he drenched the bed and the sofa. It was all over in little more than a quarter of an hour. The cistern was saved. But the bed-furniture was destroyed; and the room, though the fire was soon rendered uninhabitable, for that night at least, and probably for many nights to come.

Geoffrey and the boy left the room, after turning to Anne, pointed across the passage.

"You won't be much inconvenienced by this," he said. "You have only to shift your quarters to the spare room."

With the assistance of the lad, he moved Anne's boxes, and the chest of drawers, which stood, escaped damage in the opposite room. This done, he continued her to be careful with her candles for the future—and went down stairs, without waiting to hear what she said in reply. The lad followed him, and was dismissed for the night.

Even in the confusion which attended the extinguishing of the fire, the conduct of Hester Dethridge had been conspicuously purpose. She kept herself on the extension of Anne.

She had come out from her bedroom, when the alarm was given; had looked at the flaming curtains; and had drawn back, stolidly submissive, into a corner to wait the event. There she had stood—to all appearance, utterly indifferent to the possible destruction of her own cottage. The fire extinguished, she still waited impenetrably in her corner, while the chest of drawers and the bedding were being carried from the locked the door, without even a passing glance at the scorched ceiling and the burned bed-furniture—put the key into her pocket—and went back to her room.

Anne had hitherto not shared the conviction felt by other persons who were brought into contact with Hester Dethridge, that the woman's mind was deranged. After what she had just seen, however, the general impression became her impression too. She had thought of putting certain questions to Hester, when they were left together, as to the origin of the fire. Reflection decided her on saying nothing, for that night at least. She crossed the passage, and entered the spare room—the room which she had declined to occupy when it was at the cottage, and which she was obliged to sleep in now.

The lad had effected very little change in the disposition of the furniture of the room.

The bed had been moved. The head—set, when the bed had been in it, against the side wall of the cottage—was placed now against the partition wall which separated the room from Geoffrey's bedroom. The new arrangement had evidently been effected with a settled purpose of convenience. The hook in the ceiling which supported the curtains (the bed, unlike the bed in the other room, having no canopy attached to it) had been moved with it, to adapt itself to the change that had been made. The chairs and the washhand-stand, formerly placed against the partition wall, were now, as a matter of necessity, shifted over to the vacant space against the side wall of the cottage. In the rest, no other alteration was visible in any part of the room.

Anne's first impression on any event not immediately intelligible on the face of it, was an event to be distrusted. Was there a motive for the change in the disposition of the bed? And was it, by chance, a motive in which she was concerned?

In the present unsettled state of her mind, before a startling suspicion succeeded it. Was there some secret purpose to be answered by making the bed in the spare room? Did the question which the servant had heard Geoffrey put to Hester, on the evening of the storm, refer to it? Was the fire which had so unaccountably caught the curtains in her own room, been, by any possibility, a fire purposely kindled, to force her out?

She dropped into the nearest chair, faint with horror, as those three questions forced themselves in rapid succession on her mind.

After waiting a little, she recovered self-possession enough to reconsider the first alarm by necessity of putting her suspicions to the test. It was possible that her excited fancy had filled her with groundless apprehensions. For all she knew to the contrary, there might be some undeniably sufficient reason for changing the position of the bed. She went out, and knocked at the door of Hester Dethridge's room.

"I want to speak to you," she said.

Hester came out. Anne pointed to the spare room, and led the way to it. Hester followed her.

"Why have you changed the place of the bed?" she asked, pointing from the wall there, to the wall here?"

Sullenly submissive to the question, as she had been stolidly submissive to the fire, Hester Dethridge wrote her reply. On all other occasions she was accustomed to look the persons to whom she offered her slate steadily in the face. Now, for the first time, she handed it to Anne with her eyes on the floor. The one fine written word left no direct answer: the words were these:

"I have reasons for changing the position."

"I ask you why you have moved it."

She wrote these four words on the slate: "The wall is damp."

Anne looked at the wall. There was no sign of damp on it. Stronger she passed her hand over it. Feel where she might, the wall was dry.

"I . . . is not your reason," she said.

Hester stood silent.

"There is no dampness in the wall."

Hester quietly rubbed out with her pencil to the four words, still without looking up—waited a moment for Anne to read them again—and left them.

It was plainly useless to call her back. Anne's first impulse when she was alone again was to secure the door. She not only locked it, but bolted it at top and bottom. The mortise of the lock and the mortises of the bolts, when she tried them, were firm. The jarring treachery—whatever else it might be—was not in the fastenings of the door.

She looked all round the room: examining the place, in the first instance, as its shutters, the corners of the wardrobe, the hidden space under the bed. Nothing was anywhere to be seen, the closest search could justify the most timid person living in feeling suspicion or alarm.

Satisfied—even as they were, failed to convince her. The presentiment of some hidden treachery, existing in the room, remained secure in her in the dark, had roosted itself firmly in her mind. She sat down, and tried to trace her way back to the clue through the earlier events of the day.

The effort was fruitless: nothing definite, nothing tangible, rewarded it. Worse still, a new doubt grew out of it—a doubt whether the motive which Sir Patrick had avowed (through Blanche) was the motive for helping her which was really in his mind.

Did he sincerely believe Geoffrey's conduct to be animated by no worse object than a mercenary one? Or had he some ulterior purpose in wishing to remove her out of her husband's reach, to force Geoffrey's consent to their separation on the terms which Julius had proposed? Was this really the side and that he had in view? or was he secretly convinced (knowing Anne's position as he knew it) that she was in personal danger at the cottage? and had he considerately kept that conviction concealed, in the fear that he might otherwise encourage her to feel alarmed about herself? She looked round the strange room, in the silence of the night, and she felt that the latter interpretation was the likeliest interpretation of the two.

The sound caused by the closing of the doors and windows reached her from the ground-floor. What was to be done?

It was impossible to show the signal which had been agreed on to Sir Patrick and Arnold. The window in the room in which the fire was the window of the room in which the fire had broken out—the room which Hester Dethridge had locked up for the night.

It was equally hopeless to wait until the policeman passed on his beat, and to call him. Even if she could prevail upon herself to make that open acknowledgment of distrust under her husband's roof, and even if help were near, what valid reason could she give for raising an alarm? There was not the shadow of a reason to justify any one in declaring her under the protection of the law.

At a last resource, impelled by her blind distrust of the change in the position of the bed, she attempted to move it. The utmost exertion of her strength was not sufficient to displace a piece of furniture out of its place, by so much as a hair's breadth.

There was no alternative but to trust to the security of the locked and bolted door, and to keep watch through the night—certain that Sir Patrick and Arnold were, on their part, also keeping watch in the neighborhood of the cottage. She took out her work and her books; and returned to her chair, placing it near the table in the middle of the room.

The last noises which told of human life and movement there died away. The breathless stillness of the night closed round her.

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-SIXTH.

THE MEANS.

THE new day dawned; the sun rose; the household was astir again. Inside the spare room, and outside the spare room, nothing had happened.

At the hour appointed for leaving the cottage to pay the promised visit to Holchester House, Hester Dethridge and Geoffrey were alone together in the bedroom in which Anne had passed the night.

"She's dressed, and waiting for me in the front room," said Geoffrey. "I've wanted to see me here alone. I've got away from her for a minute or two. What is it?"

Hester pointed to the bed.

"You want it moved (from the wall?" Hester nodded again.

They moved the bed some feet away from the partition wall. After a momentary pause, Geoffrey looked again.

"It must be done to-night," he said. "Her friends must believe she's the girl may come back. It must be done to-night."

Hester bowed her head slowly.

"How long will it be before you leave the house?"

She held up three of her fingers.

"Three last mean three hours?"

She nodded her head.

"Will it be alive in that time?"

She made the affirmative sign once more.

Thus far, she had never lifted her eyes to his. In her manner of replying to him while he spoke, in the slightest movement that she made when necessity required it, the same lifeless submission to him, the same mute horror of him, was perceptible. He had, thus far, silently resented this, on the ground that the point of issuing the room the restraint which he had laid on himself gave way. But the first look, the first word, roused it.

"Why the devil can't you look at me?" he asked.

She let the question pass, without a sign to show that she had heard him. He angrily repeated it. She wrote on the slate, and held it out to him—still without raising her eyes to his face.

"You know you can speak," he said. "You know I have found you out. What's the use of keeping the truth with me?"

She persisted in holding the slate before him. He read these words:

"I have nothing to you, and blind to you. Let me be."

"Let you be!" he repeated. "It's a little late in the day to be scrupulous, after what you have done. Do you want your Confession back, or not?"

As the reference to the Confession passed his lips, she looked at him at last. A faint tinge of color showed itself on her livid cheeks; a momentary spasm of pain stirred her deathlike face. The first interest that she had shown in the ways and interest of recovering the manuscript which had been taken from her. In that appeal she answered intelligence still faintly assailable—and to no other.

"Remember the bargain on your side," Geoffrey went on, "and I'll remember the bargain on mine. This is how it stands, you know. I have taken your Confession; and I find one thing wanting. You don't tell how it was done. I know you smothered him—but I don't know how. I want to know. You're dumb; and you can't tell me. You must do it again here, as you did it in the other house. You run no risks. There isn't a soul to see you. You have got the place to yourself. When I come back you shall tell me all like the other wall—at that small hour of the morning you know, when you were writing with the towel in your hand, for the first stroke of the clock. Let me find that: has either tomorrow you shall have your Confession in your own hands.

As the reference to the Confession passed his lips for the second time, the sinking energy in the woman leaped up in her once more. She matched her slate from her side; and, writing on it rapidly, held it, with both hands, close under his eyes. He read these words:

"I won't wait. I must have it to-night."

"Do you think I keep your confession about me?" said Geoffrey. "I haven't even got it in the house."

She staggered back; and looked up for the first time.

"Don't alarm yourself," he went on. "It's sealed up with my seal; and it's safe in my banker's keep ing. I posted it to them myself. You don't catch me, Mrs. Delafield. Ha! I had kept it locked up in the house, you might have forced the lock when my back was turned. But I had kept it about me—I might have had that towel over my face, in the small hours of the morning! The bankers will give you back your Confession—just as they have received it from me—on receipt of an order in my handwriting. Do what I have told you; and you shall have the order to-night.

She passed her apron over her face, and drew a long breath of relief. Geoffrey turned to the door.

"I will be back at six this evening," he said. "Shall I find it done?"

She bowed her head.

His first condition accepted, he proceeded to the second.

"When the opportunity offers," he resumed, "I shall go up to my room. When you hear me ring the dining-room bell you will follow me up—and you will show me how you did it in the empty house?"

She made the affirmative sign once more.

At the next movement the dust of the passage below was opened and closed again. Geoffrey instantly went down stairs. It was nothing to him Anne might have forgotten something; and it was necessary to prevent her from returning to her own room.

They met in the passage.

"Tired of waiting in the garden?" he asked, abruptly.

She pointed to the dining-room.

"Have you given me a letter for you, through the grating in the gate," she answered. "I have put it on the table in there."

He went in. The handwriting on the address of the letter was the handwriting of Mrs. Glenarm. He put it unread into his pocket, and went back to Anne.

"Step out!" he said. "We shall lose the train."

They started for their visit to Holchester House.

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-SEVENTH.

THE END.

At a few minutes before six o'clock that evening, Lord Holchester's carriage brought Geoffrey and Anne back to the cottage.

Geoffrey prevented the servant from ringing at the gate. He had taken the key with him; and he left home earlier in the day. Having admitted Anne, and having closed the gate again, he went on before her to the kitchen. Sophia presented to Hester Delbridge.

"Take some fresh water into the drawing-room, and fill the vase on the chimney-piece," he said. "The sooner you put those flowers into water," he added, turning to his wife, "the sooner they will last."

He pointed, as he spoke, to a nosegay in Anne's hand, which Julian had gathered for her from the conservatory at Holchester House. Leaving her to arrange the flowers in the vase, he went up stairs. After waiting for a moment, he was joined by Hester Delbridge.

"Done?" he asked, in a whisper.

Hester made the affirmative sign. Geoffrey took off his boots, and led the way into the spare room. They noiselessly moved the bed back to its place against the partition wall—and left the room again. When Anne entered it, some minutes afterward, not the slightest change of any kind was visible since she had last seen it in the middle of the day.

She removed her bonnet and mantle, and sat down to rest.

The whole course of events, since the previous night, had tended one way, and had produced the same delusive influence over her mind. It was impossible for her any longer to resist the conviction that the bold distrusted agreement was the slightest reason, and that she had permitted purely ceaseless suspicion to get the better of her.

Geoffrey was alarmed. In the firm belief that she was in danger, she had watched through the night—and nothing had happened. In the confident anticipation that Geoffrey had promised what he was resolved not to perform, she had waited, to see what excuse he would find for keeping her at the cottage. And, when the time came for the visit, she found him ready to fulfil the engagement which he had made. At Holchester House, not the slightest interference had been attempted with her perfect liberty of action and speech. Resolved to inform Sir Patrick that she had changed her mind, she had described the alarm of fire and the events which had succeeded it, in the fullest detail—and had not been once checked by Geoffrey from beginning to end. She had spoken in confidence to Blanche, and had never been interrupted. Walking round the conservatory, she had dropped behind the others with perfect impunity, to say a grateful word to Sir Patrick, and to ask if the interpretation that he placed on Geoffrey's conduct was really the interpretation which had been formed by Blanche. They had talked together for ten minutes or more. Sir Patrick had assured her that Blanche had correctly represented his opinion. He had formed no conviction that the rash way in, in her case, the right way: and that she would do well (with his assistance) to take the initiative, in the matter of the separation, on herself. "As long as he can keep you under the same roof with him,"—Sir Patrick had said—"so long he will speculate on our anxiety to release you from the oppression of living with him; and so long he will hold out with his brother (in the character of a penitent husband) for higher terms. Put the spirit in the window, and let him go penniless to-night. Once find your way to the garden door, and I answer for keeping you safely out of his reach until he has submitted to your own condition, and has signed the deed." In those words, Anne had found the encouragement which she received, in return, her promise to be guided by his advice. She had gone back to the drawing-room; and Geoffrey had seen no opportunity in her absence. She had returned to Fulham, alone with him in his brother's carriage; and he had asked no questions. What was more natural, with her means of judging, to infer from all this? Could she see into Sir Patrick's mind, and detect that he was deliberately concealing his own conviction, in the face of all that might paralyze her energies if he acknowledged the alarm to her that he really felt? No. She could only accept the false appearances that surrounded her in the disguise of truth. She could only adopt, in good faith, Sir Patrick's assumed point of view, and believe, on the evidence of her own observation, that Sir Patrick was right.

Toward dusk, Anne began to feel the exhaustion which was the necessary result of a night passed without sleep. Her head ached, and she asked for some tea.

Hester Delbridge answered the bell. Instead of making the usual sign, she stood considering —and then wrote on her slate. These were the words: "I have all the work on my hands. The girl has gone. If you would have your tea in the drawing-room, you would save me another journey up stairs."

Anne at once engaged to comply with the request.

"Are you ill?" she asked; noticing, faint as the light now was, something strangely altered in Hester's manner.

Without looking up, Hester shook her head.

"Has any thing happened to vex you?"

The negative sign was repeated.

"Have I offended you?"

She suddenly advanced a step; suddenly kneeled at Anne; checked herself with a dull moan, like a moan of pain; and hurried out of the room.

Concluding that she had inadvertently said, or done, something to offend Hester, Anne pondering. Anne determined to return to the subject at the first favorable opportunity. In the mean time, she descended to the ground-floor. The dining-room door, standing wide open, showed her the parlor waiting for her. She wrote a letter—with the fatal brandy-bottle at his side.

After what Mr. Speechell had told her, it was her duty to mention, by the appointed hour, without an instant's hesitation.

"I prefer to have my tea sent up," she said. "I think you have forgotten what Mr. Speechell told you about thin."

She pointed to the bottle. Geoffrey looked at it; looked down again at his letter; and impatiently shook his head, as if he could not attempt at remonstrance—again without effect. He only said, "All right!" in lower tones than were customary with him, and left the room. The captain. It was useless to court a third repulse. Anne went into the drawing-room.

The letter on which he was engaged was an answer to the letter received that day from Mrs. Glenarm. He had read the two overflowing sentences when Anne spoke to him. They run as follows: "I am happy to say that there is no fear long, which you don't look for. Stay where you are through to-morrow, and wait to hear from me."

After sealing the envelope, he emptied his glass of brandy and water; and waited, looking through the open door. When Hester Delbridge crossed the passage with the tea-tray, and entered the drawing-room, he rose and followed her. She agreed on. He rang his bell. Hester came out again, closing the drawing-room door behind her.

"Is she safe at her tea?" he asked, pointing to his heavy boots, and putting on the slippers which were placed under his chair.

Hester bowed her head.

He pointed up the stairs. "You go first," he whispered. "No sound; and no noise."

She ascended the stairs. He followed slowly. Although he had only drunk enough to clear his head and water, his step was uncertain already. With one hand on the wall, and one hand on the banister, he made his way to the first landing, and listened for a moment; then joined Hester in his own room, and softly locked the door.

"Well?" he said.

She was standing motionless in the middle of the room—and, in reply, she pointed to a machine waiting to be set in movement. Finding it useless to speak to her, he looked round, with a strange sensation of shrinking in him as he did so, and, at last to the partition wall.

The hanging roused her. She drew a deep and vacant face—moving as if she was making in her sleep—she led the way to the paper—and, knelt down at the skirting-board; and, aking out two small sharp nails, lifted up a r g strip of the paper which had been detached on the plaster beneath. Mounting on a chair, she turned back the strip and pinned it up, out of the way, among the two nails, which she had kept ready in her hand.

By the last dim rays of twilight, Geoffrey looked at the wall.

A hollow space met his view. At a distance of some three feet from the floor, the laths had been sawn away, and the plaster had been ripped out, piecemeal, so as to leave a cavity, sufficient in height and width to allow free power of working in any direction, to a man's arm. The cavity completely pierced the substance of the wall. Nothing but the paper on the other side prevented eye or hand from penetrating into the next room.

Hester Delbridge got down from the chair, and made signs for a light.

Geoffrey took a match from the box. The same strange uneasiness which had already possessed his feet, appeared now to possess his hands. He ran round them, as he struck the match on the paper, and broke it. He tried another, and struck it too lightly to kindle the flame. Hester took the box out of his hands. Having lit the candle, she held it low, and pointed to the skirting-board.

Two little books were found into the floor, near the part of the wall from which the paper had been removed. Two lengths of fine and strong string were attached to one or two round the books. The loose ends of the string, extending to some length beyond the twisted parts, had been coiled away against the skirting-board. The other ends, driven tight, disappeared in two small holes drilled through the wall, at a height of a foot from the floor.

After first untwisting the strings from the books, Hester rose, and held the candle so as to light the cavity in the wall. Two more pieces of the fine string were drawn out, resting loose upon the uneven surface which marked the lower boundary of the hollowed space. Following these hidden strings, Hester lifted the loosened paper in the next room—the lower strings, which had previously held the paper firm, and flat against the sound portion of the wall, working in their holes, and allowing the paper to move up freely. As it rose higher and higher, Geoffrey saw thin strips of cotton wool lightly attached, at intervals, to the back of the paper, and so effectually to prevent it from making a grating sound against the wall. The last of the strings (till it could be pulled through the hollow space, and pinned up out of the way, as the strip previously lifted had been pinned before it. Hester drew back, and made way for Geoffrey to look through. There was Anne's room, visible through the wall! She softly parted the light curtains that hung over the bed. There was the pillow, on which her head would rest at night, within reach of his hand!

The deadly dexterity of it struck him cold. His nerves gave way. He drew back with a start of guilty fear, and looked round the room. A pocket flask of brandy lay on the table at his bedside. He snatched it up, and emptied it at a draught—and felt like himself again.

He beckoned to Hester to approach him.

"Believe in my efficient further," he said, "if you can. One thing I want to know. How is it all to be put right again?" Suppose this room is examined? Those strings will show."

Hester opened a cupboard and produced a jar. She took out a pot of white paint, and a mixture inside which looked like glue. Partly by signs, and partly by help of the slate, she showed how the mixture was to be applied to the back of the loosened strip of paper in the next room—how the paper could be pressed to the proper part of the wall by tightening the strings—how the strings, having served that purpose, could be safely removed—how the same process could be followed in Geoffrey's room, after the hollowed space had been filled up again with the materials waiting in the scullery, or even without filling up the hollowed piece if the time failed for doing it. In either case, the refastened paper would hide every thing, and the wall would tell no tales.

Geoffrey rose from the table. He pointed next to the towels in his room.

"Take one of them," he said, "and show me how you did it in the empty room down stairs."

As he said the words, Anne's voice reached his ear from behind the door of Mrs. Delbridge's.

It was impossible to say what might happen next. In another minute, she might go up to her room, and discover every thing. Hester pointed to the wall.

"Put it right again," he said. "Instantly!"

It was soon done. All that was necessary was to fit the two strips of paper drop back into their places—to fasten the strip to the wall in Anne's room, by tightening the two lower strings—and then to replace the nails which held the loose strips of paper in front. In a minute, the wall had resumed its customary aspect.

They stole out, and locked over the stairs into the passage below. After calling uselessly for the second time, Anne appeared; crossed over to the kitchen door, and, returning again with the kettle in her hand, closed the drawing-room door.

Hester Delbridge waited unnecessarily to receive her next directions. There were no further directions to give. The hideous dramatic representation of the woman's crime for which Geoffrey had asked was in no respect necessary: the means of concealment were ready, and the manner of using them was self-evident. Nothing but the opportunity, and the resolution to profit by it, were wanting to the last way to the end. Geoffrey signed to Hester to go down stairs.

"Get back into the kitchen," he said, "before she comes out again. I shall keep in the garden. When she goes up into her room for the night, lower yourself by the back-door—and I shall know."

Hester set her foot on the first stair—stopped—turned round—and looked slowly along the two walls of the passage, from end to end—shuddered—shook her head—and went slowly down the stairs.

"What were you looking for?" he whispered after her.

She neither answered, nor looked back—she went her way in silence to the kitchen.

He waited a minute, and then followed her.

On his way out to the garden, he went into the dining-room. The moon had risen; and the window-shutters were not closed. It was easy to find the brandy and the jug of water on the table. He mixed the two, and emptied the tumbler at a draught. "My head's queer," he whispered to himself. He passed his handkerchief over his face. "How infernally hot it is to-night!" He made for the door. As I was open, and plainly visible—and yet, he failed to find his way to it. Twice, he found himself trying to walk through the wall, on other sides. The third time, he got out, and reached the garden. A strange sensation possessed him, as he walked round and round. The night-air, the moonlight, the trees, were all intoxicate him. His mind, in a dull way, felt the same as usual; but his body was like the body of a drunken man. He felt himself advanced in the shade of Putney Church steak ten.

Anne appeared again from the drawing-room, with her bedroom candle in her hand.

"Put out the lights," she said to Hester, at the kitchen door; "I am going up stairs."

She entered her room. The insupportable sense of weariness, after the sleepless night that she had passed, weighed more heavily on her than ever. She looked her door, but forbore, on this occasion, to fasten the bolts. The dread of danger was no longer present to her mind; and there was little or no objection to using the bolts, that the unfastening of them would increase the difficulty of leaving the room noiselessly later in the night. She placed her candle on the table, and hair from her temples—and peered to and fro in the room, without thinking. Geoffrey's habits were irregular; Hester seldom went to bed—not Two hours at least—more probably three—must pass before it would be safe to communicate with Sir Patrick by means of the signal in the window. First warning, then bed. If she persisted, for the next three hours, in denying herself the repose which she sorely needed, the lighted candle on the table would be her friend through sheer exhaustion, when the time came for letting the fatal soul making the effort to escape. Sleep was falling on her even now—and sleep she must have. She had no fear of failing to wake at the needful time. Falling asleep, with a special necessity for rising at a given hour present to her mind, (like most other sensatively organized people) could rarely fail herself to wake at the given hour, instinctively. She put her lighted candle in a safe position, and laid down on the bed. In less than five minutes, she was in a deep sleep.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

LAWYERS have a ludicrous habit of identifying themselves with their clients by speaking of the latter as number. "Gentlemen of the jury," said a Western lawyer, "we are charged with manslaughter, but as we are in the trap, I will prove that we were locked up in the engine-house in a state of intoxication."

THE LADY'S SETTLEMENT—The chignon.

Haydn had the weakness of being unable to bear being represented as an old man. When he was about sixty-three years old he was one morning engaged with a painter who represented him as he then was. "Stop, stop!" cried Haydn, "I will not be put down as old! I will look fresh and youthful!" Haydn at seventy-eight years of age had by this means a very youthful look.

A rugged little urchin, begging in the street the other day, was asked by a lady, who filled his basket, if his parents were living. "Only mother," said the boy. "Then you have enough in your basket to feed them," said the lady. "Please not," said the boy. "Oh no, I haven't neither," said the lad; "for dad and me keep mother." He also the same—only, instead of dad, he watched."

A POOR MOUTH EXAMINATION—Opening dead letters.

"Do you ever swear?" said a coach to a servant lately. "your case is a scrutinatory complaint." "Pray, doctor, what is that?" "It is the inflammation of the nerves, ma'am; the nerves having fallen into the pleura, which makes the patient swear, cough, and the head sees fourteen." "Ah! doctor," exclaimed the old lady, "you have cured my leading complaint."

The artless generosity of youth is illustrated in an incident told of a little Albany boy, in the house presently with muslonary. He was one Saturday in the house, reading up from the river flourishing a dirty shingle, and exclaiming, "Oh, Bill! Bill! got a new jackknife!" "Oh, Bill! Bill! got as many boys and shingles as you can, for there's a new jackknife!" "Oh, Bill! got a new pavement—bushel all to scrape!"

PRESUMPTION AND INFIRMITY—Both staring a person in the face.

THE WORST STRADDAFF FOLLOWERS OF OUR FOURTEEN—Our clothes.

Mankind should learn temperance from the moon—the latter she gets, the shorter her horse becomes.

"When he's drunk he's more quarrelsome," said Mrs. Wiley as a cue cauchere has tested, or courses.

A voice comes from Washington Territory, saying, "Send us cradles, and a deceased unhappy Democratic respond, "Take ours!"

"MR. S——, is your customer D——a man to be trusted?" "I don't see any more so. He is to be trusted forever—he never pays."

A paper out West has for its motto: "God-will to all men who pay promptly. Devoted to news, and making money."

Josh Billings says: "Hunting after fame is like hunting after bees—hard to ketch, and sure to make you sweeny if you git one kind ketch."

A man in Portland wanted to gain admission to a panorama at half price, on the ground that he had but one eye.

A man in Council Bluffs is both a liquor-saloon keeper and an undertaker. One business helps the other.

A passenger on an Ohio railroad was aroused from a serene slumber the other night by the tooting of the whistle, and exclaimed, "The train has caught up with that confounded ox!"

"Bill Jones," said a bullying urchin to another lad, "I'll lick you!" "I'll catch you about dinner time, thing." "Well," replied Bill, "I ain't often much alone—I commonly have my legs and fists with me."

UP THE HUDSON.

A FEW years ago an honest and truly democratic gentleman from one of the Western States, who then represented this country at the court of Berlin, sat on the deck of a Rhine steamer, and listened, with undisguised uneasiness, to the rapturously expressed delight of a young American lady as they steamed by ruin after ruin. At length a rather slighting allusion to the Hudson, and the absence of romantic ruins on its banks, roused the old gentleman to an honest and quite amusing outburst of indignation against what he was pleased to call an un-American fancy for old tumble-down heaps of stone. "For my part," said he, "I can't see any beauty in them. Here we've been traveling most a week, and I've been dragged here and dragged there to look at ruins, until I'm fairly homesick for the sight of a good new barn."

The practical old gentleman undoubtedly felt what he said; but the romantic delight of the young lady was no less genuine, and her preference for the Rhine over the Hudson is a sentiment shared by thousands of Americans, who yet are not insensible to the magnificence and beauty of our own river. And every one, we fancy, who takes the sail illustrated by our artist, receives ten times the enjoyment from those portions of the river which the genius of IRVING, HOSMAN DRAKE, and HALLECK has illuminated, or which were the scene of some memorable action of the old Indian wars or the struggle for independence, than from the showiest and most expensive villas that adorn its shores.

Leaving out the romantic element of ruins and legends, there is nowhere in the world a more beautiful and enjoyable sail than that up the Hudson from New York to Albany. The Palisades and Highlands, and especially the bold scenery about West Point, present views unsurpassed in any part of the world. Even the famous scenery of the Rhine is less picturesque, with the exception of passages near St. Goar and Bingen; and those who enjoy landscape beauty for its own sake, will find here the most lovely combinations of water, hill, mountain, rocky cliffs, and verdure-clad slopes; and perhaps, for the sake of all this, almost any one might consent to overlook the absence of what is associated with the greatest wrongs as well as the most exalted virtues of the ancient time.

AN ODALISQUE.

THE engraving from RICHTER'S beautiful picture of an Oriental slave girl, which we give on this page, requires only a word of explanation.

AN ODALISQUE.—[FROM A PICTURE BY RICHTER.]

An "odalisque," or, as it is sometimes written, odah-lic, is a female slave in the harem of the Turkish Sultan, the name being derived from the Turkish word odah, signifying chamber. They are selected from among the most beautiful of the slaves brought to Constantinople, and are changed at the caprice of the Sultan, whose taste in such matters is said to be very fickle and changeable.

CHAPTER I.

CAREW OF CROMPTON.

HAD you lived in Brookenchâtre twenty years ago, or even any where in the Midlands, it would be superfluous to tell you of Carew of Crompton. Every body worth knowing was acquainted with him either personally or by hearsay. You must almost certainly have known somebody who had had an adventure with that eccentric personage —one who had been ridden down by him, for that mighty hunter never turned to the right hand nor to the left for any man, nor paid attention to any wire fence; or one whose fly-rod, tentasle, had been "cleared" by him on his famous black horse Trebizond, as animal only second to his master in the popular esteem. There are as many highly colored pictures of his performances at the Spring flag fair in memory as there are of "Dick Turpin clearing the Turnpikegate." Sometimes it is a small tradesman covering down in his cart among the carrots, while the gallant Squire hurries over him with a "Stoop your head, butcher." Sometimes it is a wagoner, reminding one of Commodore Trunnion's involuntary deed of "derring-do," who, between two high hurdles, perceives with horrified astonishment his portent flying over himself and cargo. But, at all events, the thing was done—perhaps on more than one occasion, and was allowed on all hands not only as a fact, but as a characteristic of brave sporting skill. "Carew all over," or "Just like Carew."

This phrase was also applied to many other heroic actions. The idea of "keel-hauling," for instance, adopted from the nautical code, was said to be practically enforced in the case of a famine, rumored, and other objectionable persons. In the isle of Crompton; while the ingenious invention of pannelings to poachers and agriculturists generally, by the athletic Squire, was the theme of many a joke. These punishments, though severe, were much sought after by a certain class, the same to which the pugilistic fancy and indiscriminate voter belongs, for the clenched fist invariably became an open hand after it had done its work—a golden moment, by the way, always applied after these inflictions, such as healed all wounds.

Carew of Crompton might at one time have been member for the county, if he had pleased; but he desired no such thing except in the saddle, the driving-box. He showed such skill in riding, and with "the ribbons," that some persons supposed that his talents must be very considerable in other matters, and affected to regret their misuse; but no one ever spoke but he knew better than his own chaplain; and was, or had been, so diligent a student of Holy Writ, that he could give a chapter and verse for every thing. But it must be allowed that others were not wanting to suppose that these proofs of scholarship were greatly exaggerated, and that all the wonder lay in the fact that the Squire knew any thing in matters at all; nay, a few even ventured to express their opinion that, but for his recklessness and his savagery, there was nothing more remarkable in Carew than in other sportsbirds; but this idea was never mooted within twenty miles of Crompton. The real truth is, that the time was unsuitable to the display of the Squire's particular traits. He would have been an eminent personage had he been a Norman, and lived in the reign of King John. Even now, if he could have retired to some establishment to Poland, and assumed the character of a Russian proprietor, he would doubtless have been a great prince. There was a savage magnificence about him, and also certain degrading traits, which marked the Heathen Lord. But, unfortunately, he was a Squire in the Midlands. The contrast, however, of his splendid tastes with the quiet time and industrious locality in which he lived, while it diminished his influence, did, on the other hand, no doubt enhance his reputation. He was looked upon (as Wanderoll and Mytton were) by his acquaintance as an eccentric, an altogether exceptional personage, to whom license was permitted; and the charitable divided the license, for his alms, by his sins. Women, and Carew.

The same philosophic few, however, who denied him talent, averred that he was half mad; and indeed Fortune had so lavishly showered her favors on the Squire in his birth, that it would be that they had turned his head. His father had died while Carew was an infant, and all of the surplus income from his vast estates had accumulated to an enormous sum when he attained his majority. At the same time, his mother, who her had supplied him with funds out of all proportion to his tender years. At the same time, he had a pack of harriers of his own, and hunted the county negatively twice a week. At the public he refused, where he was with difficulty prevented to remain for a short period, he had an allowance the amount of which would have been ample for the needs of a professional man with a wife and family, and yet it recorded of him that he had the audacity—"by jing he had!" as the man," and it was "so like Carew," they said—to complain to his guardian, a great lawyer, that his means were insufficient. He also demanded a lump sum down, on the ground that (being at the ripe age of fourteen) he contemplated marriage. The reply of the legal dignitary is preserved, as well as the young gentleman's application: "If you can't live upon your allowance, you may starve, Sir; and if you marry, you shall not have your allowance."

You had only—having authority to do so—to advise Carew, and he was positively certain to go counter to your opinion; and did you attempt to oppose him in any purpose, you would infallibly insure its accomplishment. He did not marry at fourteen, indeed, but he did so clandestinely in less than three years afterward, and had scarcer but at the age of five-and-twenty, when our stage opens, he had neither wife nor child, but lived as a bachelor at Crompton, which was sometimes called "the open house," by reason of its profuse hospitalities and sometimes "Liberty Hall," on account of its freedom. Otherwise it was never called any thing but Crompton; never Crompton Hall, or Crompton Castle, and once or twice, when the fact was known to himself only, his name was never used at all. The Squire's own consciousness of this fact made him more contumerous and reckless than ever. "Time," he swore, "I shall call my play Ina tricks. He was as good a man as ever he was. There was no reason why he should be more or less, to be put through yet, and, by Jove, he would see it out!" Of course he did not swear by Jove; for, as we have said, he was a Heathen, and was therefore by heathen.

One of the arguments that the mothers of those young ladies who sought his hand were wont to make use of, to their great comfort, was that Mr. Carew was a gentleman. There was a private chapel at Crompton, the existence of which, of course, explained why his presence did not greet his parish church. Then his genealogy was of the most satisfactory description. Carews had dealt out Crompton in direct succession for many a century. Charles I., it is almost unnecessary to state, had slept there—the most honorable testimonial to a house that honored all old English mansions with a night's visit—and had written a letter from the room in which Queen Elizabeth had also been most graciously pleased to visit her subject, John Carew, on which occasion the royal arms over had been erected for her in the park, from which to see "ten bucks, the having been slain, pulled down with great soundes;" she shot deer, too, with her own virgin hands, for which purpose "a crepe-bowe was delivered to her, with a quiver with a sweet song." These things, however, were in no way commendable to Carew, who, in the days of his youth, egotism swallowed up historical association. His favorite female bull-dog, with her pups, slept in the royal nursery-bed, and the Princess in Crompton Chase held remarkable were those days when the Squire's cover had made an unprecedentedly long shot, or had beaten off one of the wild Turtle without wings, or had run down a dog in fact. The Carews as no relic of ancient times preserved whatever, except that as middle-aged men, in the most wry economical mood, was kept of driving the red deer round the park, and then swimming them through the lake before the house—a spectacle, by-the-by, to say how those who have been accustomed to "drive deer." One peculiar virtue of Carew—he was not relaxed, however, by all his riotous, and some of his squads, as "Squire" only—was, we had almost forgotten to say, his regard for truth, which may truly be said to have been "passionate," if we consider the effect produced in him by the slightest departure from one had told him a falsehood. He would fall upon them tooth and nail, if they were in his house, or in a bagged one was his delight), he was guilty of much worse things. However, this is certain, that Carew of Crompton never told a lie.

CHAPTER II.

WAITING FOR AN INTRODUCTION.

WE have said that Carew was not exclusive; so long as he had his own way in every thing he was very good-humored with every good-looking person he permitted not only his friends but his dependants to be present at his revels. Even if he had a tyrant only by fits and starts, and in the mean time there was anarchy at Crompton. Every night in the year the young lords, the gamekeeper's guests, down to the earth-stopper's assistant, who came for the occasion of ale to the back door, did pretty much as seemed right in his own eyes. There were times when every thing had to be done in order to render the master's eye, no matter at what loss, or even risk to limb or life, but another time when he was indifferent to any thing—except dinner. The guests arose in the morning, or lay in bed all day, exactly as they pleased, and left their marks in public or in their own rooms; but when the great dinner-hour (again) a the time dinner-parties at Crompton—and there was a party of the most heterogeneous order. The dinner-parties, therefore, very gay affairs; the banquets was sumptuous, and the great cellars were laid under contribution liberally. Of a guest did happen to be unpunctual, from whatever cause, even if it were illness, the host would send for his best, or his half-dozen bull-dogs, and proceed to the sick man's room, with the unvowed intention (and he always kept his word) of "drawing the badger." In spite of his four-legged auxiliaries, this was not always an easy task. His recklessness, though not often, did sometimes meet with its match in that of the badger; and in one charge of door and bedstead they found themselves on a couple of bullet-holes, which showed that assault was the only way to know.

With such rough manners as Carew had, it may seem strange that he was never called to account for them at twelve paces; but, in the first place, it was thoroughly understood that he would have "gone out" (a fact which has doubtless given pause to many a challenge), and would have shot as straight as though he were partridge-shooting; and secondly, as we have said, he had a special license for practical jokes; the subjects of them, too, were not men of delicate susceptibilities, for none such, by any accident, could have been his guests. The consideration of good fare, good wine, a good mount in the hunting-field, excellent shooting, and of a loan from the host whenever they were without funds, men over good position were found to "put up" very good-naturedly with the eccentricities of the master of Crompton, and he had his heaven for all the year. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that the servants were equally willing to compound for some occasional ill usage, in return for general laxity of rule, and many uncosidered trifles in the way of perquisites. His huntsman and whips got now and then a severe basting; his grooms found it very inconvenient when "Squire" took it into his mad head to sally forth on horseback across country by moonlight; and still worse, when he would have the whole stud out and set every servant in his employ, not excepting his fat French cook, in the saddle, to see how they would comport themselves under the unaccustomed excitement of a steeple-chase. But upon the whole, the servants at Crompton lived in any berth of it, and seldom voluntarily took their discharges.

Perhaps the best situations, as being less liable to the per contra in the shape of the master's inconsiderate whims, were those of the game-keepers, of whom old Walter Grange was one. He was a hunchback, almost all of whose life, it was not good for any one with wife or daughter (if these were young, at least) to take service with Carew of Crompton; and living a quasi-courtage, far too large for him, in the very heart of the chase, Grange thought it no hurns to take a wife. The unfortunate old woman did not like siesats and kept his rooms tidy would do the same office for another who was not particular in his food, and could rough it a little in other respects; and such a one had Walter luckily found in the person of a wagging gamekeeper, Richard Yorke. This gentleman was a bachelor, and had no domestic encumbrance; but having (as he said) happened to see a certain guarded advertisement in the Times headed, "To Armies and Navies," had hastened in the midst of forces scenery could be procured for that serene purpose next to nothing, he had come down from London in the autumn on the chance, and found them suitable.

"To poor or painter's eye, indeed, the lodge was charming; it was small, of course, but very picturesquely built, and afforded the new tenant two new-invented sitting-room, with, of school such as few dwellings in England, and probably none elsewhere, can boast of. The front ground was an open lawn, on which scores of fine-plumaged pheasants strutted briskly, and myriads of rabbits sunned themselves or ran to play and dibble—bordered by crops of fern, above which moved steadily the antlered deer. A stream of no two of mighty girth guarded this open space; but on both sides vast glades shut in the prospect with a wall of deep-colored light and shadow, and deepened into sylvan gloom. But right in front the impending mass of the Mount Hazel, and exhibited all varieties of forest scenery; copses with "Autumn's fiery finger" on their tender leaves; still, shining pools, where water-fowl bred and dwelt; broad pathways, across which the wilder deer could bound at leisure; or one would leap in haste, and half a hundred follow in groundless panic. The wealth of animal life in that park astounded, where the vegetable was not hardly ever heard, was prodigious; the rarest birds were common there; even those who had been accustomed by the sea were entertained lured to this as silent spot, and skimmed above its unbroken calm as on the billow. The sea-gull and the osprey had been caught there; and, indeed, a specimen of each was caged in a sort of aviary, which Grange had built and constructed at the back of the lodge; while Yorke's sitting-room was generally stuffed full of these strange, feathered visitants, which had fallen victims to the keeper's gun. The horse-hair rein had a nodal cover of deer-skin; the chairs, foot-stool and the legs were made of furs, or skins that would have fetched their price when they had been living ones, although once worn by British beast or "varmint." The walls were stuck with antlers, and the very handle of the bell-rope was the hoof-part of a stag. Each of these had its story; and nothing pleased the old man better than to listen to his lodger to his long-winded tales of how and where and when the thing was slain. All persons whose forms are framed in the open air, and who experience solitude, seem in this respect to be descendants of Baron Munchausen; their sentences expressions and unnecessary prolixeness as to date and place by the patience of all other kinds of men, and this was the chief cross which Grange's lodger had to bear as an offset to the excellence of his cookery. It must be confessed that he did not bear it meekly. To stop old Walter in mid-talk—without an open quarrel—was an absolute impossibility; but his youthful companion would turn the stream of his discourse, without much ceremony, from the records of badgers into another channel (almost as natural to it)—the characteristics and peculiarities of his master Carew. Of this subject, notwithstanding that that other made him free and fume so, Yorke never seemed to tire.

"I should like to know your master," he had said, half smusingly, after listening to one of these strange recitals, soon after his arrival at the lodge, "I should like to know your master," he had said, half smusingly, after listening to one of these strange recitals, soon after his arrival at which Grange ha' answered, laughing: "Well, Squire's a very easy one to know. He's just as blind, by every road-side, without much troubling himself as to who they are, I promise you."

The young man's face grew dark with anger; but the idea of self-respect, for less of pride, was necessarily strange to a servant of Carew's, or a Grange went on, unconscious of offense: "Now, if you were a young woman," he chuckled, "and no good-looking as you are as a lad, there would be none more welcome than yourself up at the big house. Pretty gals, bless 'ee, need no introduction yonder; and yet one would have thought that Squire would know better than to meddle with the mischievous hussies—the trade looking sorely enough, at all events. Why, he married before he was your age, and was as much of a man to look at as another. You have heard talk of that, I dare say, however, in London?"

Richard Carew, as the keeper had stated, was a very handsome lad—brown-cheeked, blue-eyed, and with rich clustering hair in black curls; but at this moment he did not look prepossessing. He frowned and flushed a furious glance upon the speaker; but old Grange, who had an eye like a hawk, for the objects that a hawk desires, was as blind as a mole to any evidence of human emotion short of a punch on the head, and went on unheeding:

"Well, I thought you must ha' heard o' that too. We folk down here heard o' nothing else for all that year. She got hold o' Squire, this ere woman did, though he was but a school-boy, and she did enough to be his mother, bless ye, and was second to him. And they kept it secret for six months; and that's what bangs me most about it all. For Carew, he can keep nothing secret—nothing: he hasn't got the art, and that's why he seems so much worse than he is to some people. Oh, she must have been a deep one, she must!"

"You never saw her, then?" asked Yorke, carelessly shutting his eyes, as though from the westering sun, which Midas-like, was turning every thing it touched in that broad landscape into gold.

"Oh yes, I see her; she was here with Squire near half a year. Mrs. Carew—that's what the menus—was at Crompton then; and the young one—though she was no infant neither—must have tried to get her turned out; but she wasn't clever enough, cleve as she was, for that job. Carew loved his mother, as indeed he should, for she had never denied him any thing since he was born; and so, in that pitched battle between the women, he took his mother's side. And in the end she did lady took his, and with a vengeance. I do think that if it had not been for that, the old madam would have held on—Why, what's the matter, young gentleman? That was an oath fit for the mouth of Squire himself!"

"It's this cursed toothache," exclaimed Yorke, passionately. "It has worried me all day, and now you begon to speak that I should have gone mad if I had not let out at a bit. Never mind me: I'm better now."

"Well, that's like the Squire again," returned the keeper, admiringly. "He always was a one to hit himself better for letting out at things, and at people too, for the matter of that. To hear him sometimes, one would almost think the ground must open; not that he means any harm, but it's a way he's got; but it does frighten folks as is not used to him, surely. I mind that day when he first took the fox-hounds out, and Mr. Howard the sheriff as was that year—he's dead and gone long since, and his grandson is sheriff now again, which is curious—well, he happened to ride a bit too forward with the dogs, and our young master— Oh dear, dear, and the old man began to chuckle like a hen that has had two eggs at a time, "how he did swear at the old man!"

"For were talking about Mrs. Carew the old-er," observed the artist, coolly.

"Was I? True, so I was. Well, she and the young Squire was for all the world like a deer with her fawn—all tenderness and timidity, so long as he was let alone; but when they got a man came, as she considered his enemy, she was as bold as a cock-sparrow—ay, and as quarrelsome. It was through her, I say, that the bride got the neck at last; and when that was done the old lady seemed to have done with life, and was content enough when her son portioned her off, and graciously let her live on the dower house at Morden; and indeed she could hardly have stuck at Crompton, with such goings on as there are now—deceivings and fightings at every turn."

"Just so," interrupted the young painter; "she got her way, I know. But with reference to the younger lady, Mrs. Charles Carew, what was she like, and what did people say of her?"

"Well, not much good, I reckon. They could they say of a school-mistress who marries her pupil?"

"A school-mistress, was she?" said Yorke, in a strange husky voice. "We never heard that in London."

"Well, she was summat of that sort, Sir, though I don't know exactly what. Young as she was, Carew was not quite eighteen, and not at a dame's school, that's true. But she was not a mere governess, as some said, neither. For she could play and sing—ay, songs that pleased him too—and she had book-learning. I've heard, such as would have astonished you or me, about folks said she was a witch, and had the devil's help to catch Carew. But it wasn't nothing of the sort, magic, bless you, to come over a lad of seventeen —not she. What nonsense people talk! If any pretty girl about Crompton was to take a fancy to you now, as is like enough, she you suppose—"

"But I thought you and that Mrs. Charles Carew was not a girl?"

"Nor more she was: she was five-and-thirty if she was a day; and yet—there was the wonder of it—she did not look much over twenty! I've heard our gentlemen, when out shooting with her to some fine Frenchwoman as never grew old, and was fell in love with unbeknown by her grandson. Now, what was her name? I got it written down somewhere in my old pocket-book; it was summat like Longchêne."

"Nivon de l'Eschet?" suggested Yorke, without a smile.

"Ay, that's the name. Well, Mrs. Charles Carew, as you call her, was just like her, and a regular everlasting! She was not what you could call pretty, but very "taking" looking, and with a bloom and freshness on her as would have deceived any man. Her voice was like music itself, and she moved like a stag o' ten: and the Squire was like a man in a pretty rage. I promise you; though to get to know him, as I do, is easy enough, if you only take him straight at it. If you were a good rider, for instance, and could lend the field one day when the hunting begins, he'd ask you to dinner to-morrow; or if you could drive stags—why, he would have given you a hundred pounds last autumnwhen he wouldn't get the beasts to stir, for sake. There's a pretty mess come o' that, by-the-by! I don't like what reports, and would much sooner not be there to see 'em. There will be mischief some day with it yet, for all that old Lord Orford, and Squire Howard, and many years ago, used to do the same thing, they say, at a tin mines that stood where the Grange now in-hand, even by Carew. However, the Squire was his wager; and we haven't seen none o' his old work o' late years, and I hope we shall again say day."

"I had heard of that strange exploit," observed Yorke; "but as driving deer, even in the ordinary way, is not my calling, and as I am no great rider, except on a hack, I never went. I am to introduce myself to your mad Squire, and yet I have a great fancy for his acquaintance."

So you think he'd buy any of these drawings, taken in his own park, from his own timber?" The young man nodded. "Well, then, I'm well stocked with studies of oak and beech. "Here is a sketch of the Decoy Pond, for instance, with the oldest tree in the chase beside it. I would not that interest him, think you?" You think not?"

"Well, Sir," replied the keeper, "I'll answer frankly, "if I say no, it ain't that I mean any slight to your drawing. It's like the tree enough, for certain, with the water and all; but I can't count it with my own hands twenty years ago—and I'm the same since then—for any money. I care this winter's out; but I don't think the Squire cares much for such matters. He might, maybe, just give a look at 'em, and say, 'Ah, you go to the devil for a paper-staining son of a quill-wing;' and then he'd kick me down a fagthing, bless ee, for all the great pictures in his own gallery, though they cost his grandfather a mint of money, and are worth a few sight—so far as the frames go. And, on the other hand, if he happens to be over-persuaded to buy, he might tear it up before you could say 'Hold,' and kick you down the Hall steps into the horsepit, and he has done such things. That's Squire, it is, you see, the Squire is no chance."

"I don't think he would kick me down Hall steps," said Yorke, grimly.

The keeper grinned. "Well, you see, nobody can tell what he'll do. He's a fine sight—a fine brawiser, I promise you, though I grant you are a strapping young fellow, and you have told me that you have been used to your fists. He's a great thing, mind you, for a man to be hearty; a man better than does not fear him at all, I reckon. Folks talk of life-preservers and pistols, but there's nothing like a good pair of well-handled fists when one has to deal with a bully. Squire, at Crompton, man and boy, these fifty years, and has had a many rough-and-tumbles with that sort, and I have never had the worst of it yet. It prevents bloodshed on both sides: for if you haven't no shooting—and I'm sure Mr. Englishman poachers or not, who will draw trigger on you; and as for a bludgeon, it's a thing you've got in hand as another's after the first half minute."

"Is there much poaching now at Crompton?" inquired Yorke, mechanically, as if he had been plan to any less obtuse observer than his companion that he no longer gave him his attention.

"Well, no; nothing to be called serious has happened since they; though I dare say we shall have some scrimmages as the winter comes on, there's like to a good deal of what I call handy-cuffs work in the dark season. Women and children —especially children—will come into the park, under pretence of picking up sticks, and I don't say but what a new dropped fawn in their bundles, if they get the chance; and then they take it home, to be reared until it grows up, and can be sold for venison."

"I should have thought there would have been no market for such a commodity—that is, in the case of people such as you describe, observed Yorke, yawning.

"Market!" echoed the keeper, contemptuously. "There's no market for any commodity on the whole herd o' our wild-cattle, if they were but to be stolen; there'd be a market for a rhinoceros or a hedgitor, if he happened to keep 'em, bless 'on, as easy as for a sucking pig! But I don't call that poaching—I mean the lawstealing. It's the professionals from the Midland towns as come by tens and twenties at a time as is our trouble. We generally gets wind of em beforehand, and then out we all goes, and begin with no more deadly leves a fight—and then there's broken crowns and bloody noses; but, thank God, there's been no murder done, at least, not in my time, at Crompton. And that reminds me, Sir, that it's time for me to start on my evening round."

"Well, when you next have any news of such transactions, then let me know; you will let me make one of your party," said Yorke, good-humorously. "I can hit out straight from the shoulder; and perhaps I might get to be of the Squire that way."

"Ay, and a lucky a road to lead you into his good graces, Sir," said the keeper, rising, "as any I know. Are you for a walk round the park this fine evening, Sir?"

"No; not to-night, thank you, Grange. I have got to fill in this sketch a bit ibag I took this morning."

"Then, good-night, Sir, for I shn't return before dayfall."

But it was not till long after the keeper had taken his departure that Richard Yorke turned from his work of unfinished drawing. He sat staring straight before him with steadfast eyes and thoughtful brow for hours, murmuring to himself disjointed sentences: and ever and anon he started up and paced the little room with rapid strides. "He shall see me, and know me, too," muttered he, at last, between his clenched teeth, "though he could deer it, and all our lives. She shall not say I came down to this wilderness, like some hunted beast to covert, for nothing."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

AUTHORS and publishers are always, and very properly, careful concerning their copyrights. By a law which has recently passed Congress, copyrights are no longer to be taken out in the District Courts, but by application to the Secretary of State, who will attend to the steps required were to transmit a copy of the title of the work intended publication to the clerk of the United States District Court of the district in which the author or proprietor of the work resided; and after publication he must send one copy to the clerk and another copy to the Library of Congress. Now the whole business of entering copyrights will be done at the Congressional Library. The title-page is to be sent down to be recorded, and the two copies are to be forwarded to the library for its shelves. They go free by mail.

The same law makes many other changes in the law of copyrights, and also in that of patents, on which subjects we propose to give a few paragraphs next week. The recent statute may be regarded as the last-drive of the Congressional Committee some time ago to revise all the laws of the United States, as it is founded upon a bill which that Committee framed. The commission as now constituted, composed of Judge Hunter of Philadelphia, Benjamin Vaughan Abbott, and Mr. Victor C. Barringer, are proceeding with the preparation of the laws on other subjects.

Last week, at the regular weekly session of the Board of Health, only one case of smallpox was reported, and not a single death had occurred in this city during the previous week from that disease. This is the first week in nine months without a death from smallpox. Dr. Elisha Harris, one of the Health Officers that cases were announced as having occurred in that city. Either vaccination or something else appears to be protective of good results here.

A few days ago a young girl of fourteen, living at Port Jervis, was kindling a fire, and using kerosene to hasten the work, when the flames communicated to the can, and a terrific explosion followed, by which she was terribly and frightful manner. There is no more dangerous compound in the hands of the ignorant or careless than such kerosene as is commonly sold at a cheap price.

Queen Isabella did not make the renouncing of her throne a mournful business. She made a gala toilet for the occasion, and appeared—bedecked and bejewelled covered with white lace, a splendid parure of pearls, and a diamond coronet; and with that command of countenance which seldom fails to reward long practice in the profession of royal hypocrisy, she took an extremely merry look. As she took her seat in a throne-chair, Queen Isabella, in a high-pitched, excited sort, stood on her right hand, simply dressed in a short black jacket and knickerbockers. Queen Isabella smiled graciously to the assembled courtiers before she read her abdication. When the ceremony was over, the youthful King of Spain, apparently not particularly impressed by the honors conferred upon him, left for the Pacific coast. It seems to be most of the finest cements, and also is a valuable fertilizer.

De Cordova is preparing a lecture on Dickens; so is Miss Kate Field.—The Pope has received a present of a medal from a military maiden lady of Monterey, who is now in Rome.—Vinnie Ream is busily putting the finishing touches to her statue of Farragut, preparatory to its visit to this country.—The Queen of Denmark is a good woman, for it is reported, she spends only $100 a year for new dresses!

The General Superintendent of the Freedmen's Bureau states that "considering their previous condition, the advance of the freedmen in all material and moral respects unquestionably surpasses that of the white people of the Southern States. Two thousand are hundred and seventy-one day and night schools, with 1,324 night pupils, 1,061 teachers, and 98,209 pupils; 28 normal or high schools, with 3854 pupils; the advance of about 4000 pupils in the higher branches; the accumulation of $12,000,000 in savings-banks, besides nearly $11,000,000 drawn out chiefly for improvement purchases, are guarantees of the future prosperity of the freedmen, as well as evidences of the important work accomplished by the Freedmen's Bureau."

The North Adams Oriental are all young—none over twenty-two, it is said, excepting the two cooks, who are over thirty, and are the only married men in the party. All wear the national sprees. These queer men effect of great length, and tied at the end with a ribbon. When at work they are worn coiled around the crown, looking ludicrously like a lady's chignon.

Punch announces that during the present oppressive heat one of the prominent Cabinet Ministers will be "dark." Also that private refrigerators, to hold four pounds, will be furnished to the members gratis, fresh air will be given by the orchestra every half hour. The performances will commence with the farce of "Cool as a Cucumber," after which the entertainments entitled "The Sun of Tecy" to conclude with the laughable afterpiece entitled "Nothing to Wear."

Paris is repairing its streets by steam-power. The machine consists of a small steam-engine on wheels, driven by one horse, to the rear of which is attached the "paver," which is forced upon the ground by a blow from the engine, and slides on a bar some six feet long, and can then be directed by the driver to any stone which requires forcing home. The machine is now at work in the Rue de Grenelle, St. Germain, and is considered a success.

When Dickens's death was first announced in the papers a prisoner in the Newcastle gentleman sent a Boston friend in the streets of that city, and naturally the compositor turned upon the subject of his work. In reply to a remark of the Bostonian that Dickens's death was a great loss, the workman exclaimed, "Dickens! Dickens? I've heard of the name. When is he to meet? Will he be buried in Mount Auburn?"

Some time ago the ship Fortuna arrived at San Francisco from China. The captain reported that after the vessel had been out three days, Henry Williams, the way sixteen years old, fell overboard, supposed in lashing the life buoys to the taffrail, and was drowned. Recently it has been ascertained that the boy is in New York, alive and well. His own statement is that while he was on the taffrail he became dizzy and fell overboard; that he called for help, but no one heard him, and that he began to think his time had come, when a piece of cord-wood floated by him, and he swam for it. He remained in the water by the aid of this piece of wood for eleven hours, when a steamer came in sight. He hailed her, a boat was sent after him, and he was taken on board the ship. Certainly this is a most remarkable escape from death.

The new French Minister, M. Prévost-Paradol, recently arrived at Washington, accompanied by his young son, and his daughter about seventeen years old. M. Paradol is apparently a man of culture and ability, and is received with much warmth by the community. During the civil war he was a consistent and influential friend of the Union and Union cause; and on the defeated Lincoln he wrote an able article in the Journal des Débats, by which he showed his warm appreciation of the character of the martyr President. The Paradols expects to spend a part of the midsummer at Newport.

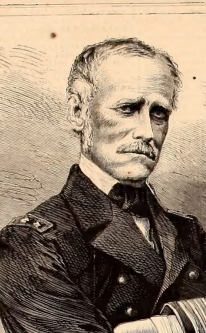
Commissioner Tweed has issued still more stringent regulations regarding the waste of the Croton water, and has announced his intention of maintaining a rigid surveillance over the use of it until such matters are generally attached, when the parties using water will be carefully about wasting it, and will be charged for all the water passing through the meter.

It appears that dogs are not to be slaughtered this year in the wholesale manner which has prevailed in former summers. It has been discovered by some scientific investigators that hydrophobia is not necessarily coincident with an elevated temperature, and in proof of this theory it is stated that there are fewer cases of it in the midsummer months than during several other seasons. In a recent lecture given by Dr. John P. Garrish at the quarterly meeting of the Medical Board of the Kansas Dispensary, it was shown, however, that the months in which the largest number of cases of the disease have occurred are September, November, and December. This indicates, considering the long period usually required for the development of the poison, that the greatest number of persons are bitten about the time of the dog-days. The period between the poisoned bite and that a man dog begins to show the presence in the system varies from a few days to two weeks, very rare more than that period. A remarkable experiment, in the interest of humanity, was made in Paris, and recently reported which did rather been bitten by mad dogs or inoculated with the virulent frothy exhibited by mad animals. Of nine number of were mad—a few within a week—died in great agony at intervals of one to 30 days. It appears that instances of hydrophobia occur much less frequently in southern than northern latitudes, and that persons are safe for a time from the bite. This peculiar malady has thus far almost baffled medical skill. Cases when a person has been bitten by a dog supposed to be rabid he suffers greatly from apprehension, and control the symptoms of a rabid animal with a wounded or abraded surface is required for the development of hydrophobia, and frequently when an animal utes through the clothing the poison does not reach the system. Dr. Garrish stated that a mad dog never has the; that the existence of epilepsy is a view great that there is no rabies; also that they do not shun the water. Dr. Garrish read the tap the water with no spasm attending the effort to swallow, but when offering little sensitiveness of the inarticulate paralysis of the muscles about the jaws and throat; also, that when the rabid dog bites he does not. It was thought a while ago that bromide of potassium would prove a remedy for this much-dreaded disease; but recent experiments, both in this country and in Europe, have proved that it is of no benefit. A celebrated veterinary surgeon, who has himself been bitten on several occasions, says that crystal of nitrate of silver rubbed into the wound will positively prevent hydrophobia. An eminent French physician recommends the Russian bath as a successful remedy. His system once having been inoculated with virus from the saliva of a patient suffering with hydrophobia, he experienced symptoms of the dreadful disease. He took a steam bath, and when it reached the heat of seventy-five degrees centigrade, all the symptoms disappeared as if by magic, and he experienced from that moment no disease. Dr. Garrish also gives his own decision in favor of the vapor bath as an effective means of eliminating the poison from the system.

ADMIRAL DAHLGREN.

REAR-ADMIRAL JOHN A. DAHLGREN, one of the most distinguished as well as one of the most useful officers of the United States Navy, died in Washington, July 12, at the age of sixty years. His health had been indifferent for some time, but the immediate cause of his death was disease of the heart.

The public career of this officer was long and honorable. Born in Philadelphia, in 1810, he was appointed a Midshipman from Pennsylvania in 1826, and made his first cruise in the frigate Macedonian, then attached to the Brazil squadron. Two years later he was transferred to the sloop of war Ontario, and remained on the Mediterranean station until 1832. He was on coast-survey duty from 1836 to 1842, was promoted to Lieutenant in 1837, and commanded the frigate Cumberland in the Mediterranean in 1844–45. On returning to the United States, in 1847, he was assigned to ordnance duty, and during the ten years devoted to this service he completed the invention with which his name is inseparably connected—the Dahlgren gun. In 1855 he was promoted to the rank of Commander. On the breaking out of the rebellion he was placed in command of the Washington Navy-yard, and shortly afterward was appointed Chief of the Ordnance Bureau. When the navy was reorganized in 1863, he received the commission of Rear-Admiral, and was assigned to the command of the South Atlantic blockading squadron, relieving Rear-Admiral DUPONT. He co-operated with General GILLMORE in the reduction of Fort Wagner and Morris Island, and assisted in demolishing the outer walls of Fort Sumter. In 1864 he established communication with General SHERMAN, when that officer reached the coast after his famous march through Georgia, assisted in the capture of Savannah, and shortly afterward occupied Charleston. After the restoration of peace he was in command of the South Pacific squadron for two years, and was then returned to the head of the Ordnance Board. In the fall of 1869 he was ordered to the command of the Washington Navy-yard for a second time, and held that important position up to the time of his death.



THE LATE REAR-ADMIRAL DAHLGREN.—[PHOT. BY M. B. BRADY, WASHINGTON, D. C.]

THE ELM PARK RIOT.

We give on this page an illustration of the terrible riot which took place in this city, July 12, between a party of "Orangemen" and a mob of Irish Catholics. The Orangemen, to the number of about twenty-five hundred, including many women and children, had assembled in Elm Park for the purpose of celebrating the anniversary of the battle of the Boyne, when WILLIAM III. defeated the forces of JAMES II. While thus peacefully engaged, they were suddenly set upon by a ferocious mob, composed of about six hundred of the lowest class of Irish Catholics, armed with clubs and pistols, who broke through the Park palings and began a wild assault upon the Orangemen, regardless of the presence of women and children. With the assistance of the police, who were promptly summoned, the rioters were repulsed, but not until several had been killed or mortally wounded on both sides, while the list of minor casualties was quite large. After the fight in the Park the mob attacked the Eighth Avenue cars, containing a large number of the Orange party, and, but for the timely interference of the police, the loss of life would have been much greater than it was. Our illustration represents the first rush of the rioters into the Park after breaking down the palings.

THE RIOT AT ELM PARK.—[DRAWN BY STANLEY FOX.]

WATER WE SHOULD NOT DRINK.

WATER visibly containing organic matter no man will drink if he can avoid the draught. He may be told by the highest authorities that the presence of organic matter does not necessarily make the water unfit for drinking, but he declines to shake his thirst from such a cup. In this imagination may wrong him. He errs, it is true, upon the side of safety, but the distinction must be maintained. The water issuing from near a peat bed may be dark in color, unpleasant to the taste, and full of organic matter, and yet be far less unwholesome to drink than a colorless or dimly transparent water, which may have many germs, drawn from some pretty nook of a shaded stream where the current moves slowly among rank weeds.

All organized bodies are formed of the same elementary substances—oxygen, hydrogen, and carbon, with frequently nitrogen. The vegetable supplies food for the animal, and the atmosphere is necessary for the existence of both. So there is a mutual necessity of being, and the continuance of one is dependent upon the permanence of the others. From this similarity in the composition of the vegetable and animal it must be difficult to distinguish the products of one from those of the other when in decomposition.

To test the organic contents and condition of a water is possible only to a chemist, but there is a simple method of examination which may always be adopted. It consists in placing a glass of water where the sunlight falls and the temperature is favorable to the production of vitality. If the germs of life are there, the vessel may in a few days be filled with microscopic forms. If nitrogen abound, animal life may appear and decomposition actively commence. But this will depend upon the state of the organic impurity. Two grains of animal matter may in the water of one locality give birth to many disagreeable creatures, while a much larger quantity in water from another locality may not contain any such miniature monsters. The nature or kind of the organic matter, therefore, must determine whether the water is fit for drinking, and till this is done let it be avoided.

Water brought into a house for domestic use in lead pipes, or from lead cisterns, should be examined before it is accepted as a safe drink. This experiment may be approximately made by placing for a few hours a piece of polished lead in the suspected water. Should the metal surface be tarnished, the water in which the film is produced has been made poisonous by its passage through lead pipes.

AH SING.

THE CHINESE IN NEW ENGLAND.

LAST week we gave our readers a sketch of North Adams, where the Chinese shoemakers have settled down, and of the general work-room where they are employed. This week we continue the series, with illustrations that give some insight into the life and ways of this peculiar class of immigrants.

The first illustration is the portrait of AH SING, the foreman of the band, who is considered one of the most intelligent Chinamen in America. He has lived some time in this country, chiefly in San Francisco, where he attended an evening school, and learned to speak and read and write English with considerable fluency and correctness. He is a smart, wide-awake specimen of a Chinaman, and exhibits no little tact in the management of his countrymen in their new situation.

The Chinese have their own culinary department, as they would find it impossible to adapt themselves to the style of cookery prevalent in most New England towns, which must be acknowledged to be almost as barbarous as their own. They also have a general sleeping apartment, fitted up with bunks very much in the manner of the steerage of an emigrant ship.—These are kept in the neatest order and scrupulously clean. As yet, the Chinese associate but little among the townspeople; though they are not molested in any way, and have their own playground for exercise and recreation. Their quiet behavior and steady application to work have done much to conciliate their neighbors, who begin to feel that even the Chinese in this country, when they behave themselves and attend to their own business, have rights which all are bound to respect.

AN ARAB MEAL.

THE basis of the Arab ordeen is, and has been for centuries, the couscoussou, also called in different countries kouss and mezzeefouf. The couscoussou is made of wheaten flour, which has been ground in portable hand-mills by the women of the camp, and then passed through a sieve, rolled with the fingers, cooked by steam, and finally sprinkled copiously either with broth or with milk. The richer Arabs add to this preparation mutton, fowl, hard eggs, beans, with artichokes, sugar, dried grapes, and sometimes, when near the coast, potatoes, which they purchase from the Christians. This is, as we have said, the national dish, perfectly suited to the climate and the habits of the people. Rich and poor equally delight in it and they are never tired of it from one end of the year to the other. It must be well cooked, and it is never eaten cold.

The staple food, however, of the poorest Arabs is the dchicha—roasted corn—which they pound and then boil with butter; or it may even consist of roasted barley or beans, which they pound also, and then wet with water, and they carry sometimes a supply of it in the corner of their burnouse.

In the way of such preparations of meal, the Arab also has the mersuez. The mersuez is made of unripe ears of barley, lightly roasted, and pounded in the hand-mill. These are then moistened with water or milk, and mixed with salt meat and butter. And there is also another compound called the cherchem, made of corn boiled in salt and water, with which they provide themselves when on expeditions in countries devoid of resources, and by the aid of which they find they can the most easily dispense with all other kinds of food.

The richer Arabs have, however, excellent bread, while the poorer folk content themselves with flat cakes of meal cooked hastily in earthenware dishes. Bread of new barley is a luxury for every Arab. For condiment the Arab not only has salt, but he makes abundant use of black and red pepper, of which the quantity he eats is enormous. It is the great delight and joy of the poor Arab: it replaces wine as a tonic; goat-skins, acquires a rancid flavor, which, however, as is the case in other parts of the world, becomes preferable to that of fresh butter by acquired taste. The Arabs, too, are passionately fond of all sorts of preparations of milk, even to their horses, esteeming it better for them than barley, and believing that for horse and man alike it is the most strengthening of all kinds of diet.

Such is the broad and simple basis of an Arab's meal; to which may be added, in the case of richer folk, roasted mutton (el kebeb mechoui), or roasted fowl, partridge, etc. And Arabs are pronounced by General Daumas to be the first rôtisseurs in the world. There may be also the kibeb, consisting of pieces of mutton roasted on a skewer; or the terbiya, a stew of mutton, with eggs and tomatoes; el khoresa, another kind of mutton stew; el mekhetter, a fricassee of fowl, with garbanzos; the dolma, a dish of meat stuffed with vegetables, and seasoned highly with Cayenne pepper; or there may be el berouaja, one of the triumphs of the Arab cuisine—a breast of mutton cut up in pieces, and arranged with butter, eggs, wild artichokes, grated cheese, and spices; el kobeina, a stew of mutton again, to which parsley and onions give the prevailing flavor.

Leaving unnoticed other dishes which form the pièces de résistance of an Arab dinner, it may be mentioned that soups also are not wanting to the hospitality of a rich Arab. Nor is the Arab pastry-cook altogether contemptible in the way of cakes and sweetmeats: the crowning glory of his workmanship is said to consist in the sebou el arouous—the "finger of the bride;" a sweetmeat most in renown at Bagdad, but which is said to be unknown in Algeria.

The Arabs, moreover, eat fruit in abundance, and when an Arab of the poorer sort leaves his tent to go to market to purchase provisions for his family, his wife winds up her list of commissions by crying after him, "And don't forget the pepper."

The butter of the Arabs, from being cured in and especially of curds and whey; they rarely drink the pure milk of the cow, and, indeed, esteem it injurious. Of goat's milk and ewe's milk they consume a great deal in different fashions. But of all sorts of milk the most prized is that of the camel, which they give and generally not quite ripe. Grapes are the most prized of fruit; then come melons, cucumbers, figs, oranges, lemons, pomegranates, apples, pears, cherries, peaches, apricots, dates. These ought to be eaten either with the couscoussou or with milk, otherwise they are not wholesome.

THE KITCHEN.—[SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.]

All account of Arab gastronomy would be incomplete without notice of the kouat, which is the prawn of the desert; but which must be taken alive and killed by Mussulmans to be fit to be eaten by Mussulmans. They are stripped of their heads, their wings, and their claws, and then roasted or boiled with the couscoussou. Horses are very fond of them, but for horse and man they are considered nourishing food.

Coffee is a luxury for the rich alone; the ordinary drink is of a bitterer taste called. His servant with the grounds and with the foam of ebullition on the surface of the cup, whose long patience has bitnated to the Eastern way of preparing coffee, return to the coffee of Europe with some disappointment.

Of such viands will the meal of the guest of the Arab host be composed. Women, as is well known, never appear before strangers; indeed the latter, if he knows the rules of Arab etiquette, will never even talk of women to his host; and this not only out of regard to the host himself, but because the wife may very probably be on the other side of the curtain which separates the man's compartment from the woman's in every tent, and whom gossip would infallibly be excited by stories of too live. ly a nature about Ayesha or Fatima. Yes, the Arab's wife is in all probability there behind the curtain, curiously watching the stranger and his habits, after having superintended the preparation of his meal. French officers who have partaken of the hospitality of Arab tents have, in fact, sometimes heard something very like a titter going on behind the curtain, which was supposed to be caused by the dimsiness which they put down to supper. For it is not only for an European in the Sahara, unaccustomed to it, to assume the seat on the carpet in Oriental fashion without making a rather ridiculous figure in the course of his exertions to the ground, as General Daumas found on one occasion when invited to dine by a native merchant—that Mussulmans do not breathe. But the difficulty of tight pantaloons and straps was not the only one experienced by General Daumas; at the moment of sitting down he perceived that at the dinner to which he was invited there were no knives, no bottles, and no glasses—not even a plate or a knife or a spoon. There was no apparatus for dining at all; for the use of cutlers and other manufacturers of crockery and glass were would infallibly have to shut up—the Mussulmans of the world were to adopt Arab habits.

The dining-table, or rather dining-carpet of leather, the sofra, was laid in the middle of the tent on the ground, and there was nothing whatever thereon, when the guests squatted down on all sides of it, like tailors about to go to work. How was the French general, after having surmounted the difficulty of passionate and strange, to eat his dinner? He hit at last upon the plan of observing his neighbors, two venerable gentlemen with white beards, who could not refrain at times from exchanging an ironical smile, which the general interpreted thus: "How will the Infidel get on here?"

The couscoussou then made its appearance in a large wooden platter, and each of the guests plunged the finger and thumb of his right hand into the mass, made a little ball of it, and tossed it into his mouth. The general followed the example of his neighbors. After this dish round button appeared, which was eaten out of the fingers. At the end of the dinner—Arab etiquette requires that a meal shall drink last—a vase of the end of the dinner—water and sour milk were passed round in wooden and earthen bowls, and then a water-pot and basin. Soap was not presented for all to wash their hands.

When the guest wishes to leave he announces his intention. His beasts of burden are prepared, his horse is brought to the door, and he is accompanied by his host to a certain distance.

When host and guest take leave of each other, the guest invokes the Divine blessing by ejaculature, or, "God will restore it" (i. e., what you have expended for me). The reply is, "Go with a blessing." Inshallah by happy-go-lucky, "If God's good beful there." "Demand thy happiness!" that is to say, "Look now to yourself, and see you were my guest your happiness was my affair; now it is your own."

If an Arab receives a Christian, he will observe the same rules with him as with an Arab. If he is a stranger, he is in malicious, however he has a hundred ways of playing tricks upon his guest without violating the rules of hospitality. He will be sure to set the latter of the best of good right, but the spirit of performance will militate grievously against their efficiency. It is a challenge to confound his Christian friend as much as possible with his Arab usages; he will have his food cooked with the most rancid butter that can be got; he will maliciously pitch his tent for him where he will be sure to be bitten by mosquitoes, by the side of a stream or on the site of an old encampment; he will either a newly weaned camel shoe by him, who will keep its mother the whole night long, or a male donkey, who will bray from sunset to sunrise; and in the morning he will come and inquire with such an innocent face and such polite salutations how his guest has slept that the latter, if he is a wise man, will do no otherwise than reply, "Excellently well. May God be merciful to the authors of thy days," and not give his host the triumph of reading any dissatisfaction in his face. If the Arab can no longer carry on the holy war against the infidel, this is a slight substitute for it; and you may perhaps continue to be guests with him in the same polite fashion, and he will respect you the more.

BABOON LIFE IN AFRICA.

NEAR the Winterberg, a mountain to the north of the eastern frontier of the Cape of Good Hope, some years ago, there were several troops of baboons, young and old, which resided in the deep rocky ravines, and ganuboled among the fearful precipices around. They had their habits and manners in their appearance and habits, especially when suddenly alarmed. The mammas were then to be seen to slip their young ones, who clung round their parents necks, and were thus carried rapidly to the summits of the rocks, whither they would gramince and cough out their defiance at the intruder who had ventured into their domains.

An enemy, however, once found his way into their stronghold, and this was an enemy huge, grey, cunning, and fierce. It was a Cape leopard. Crouching down among the long grass, or among the crevices of the rocks, the leopard would suddenly spring upon a young baboon, and actually devour it before the eyes of its screaming parents. Strong as a baboon be, the leopard is yet far stronger, and with its terrible claws could soon tear to pieces the largest male baboon.

During some days the leopard feasted on his booty, and then, having recovered from its wound, and jaunily attacked the leopard. But this time really seem to rue a grim visit, for these creatures evidently knew and respected his great powers. They had, too, as the result proved, determined on a safer and more crafty method of protecting.

They began by forming the combined strength of his adversaries, left their neighborhood, and retreated across country, but he was followed by nearly all the troops. One went before the leopard; and on followed the baboons. The day was hot, and the leopard dilated its panting nostrils, and began to seek a retreat and a shelter from the heat. Then it was that the baboons showed much sagacity. They, in fact, too, by degrees, began to thirst, his tongue hanging out of his mouth, and the white foam covering his jaws.

Then a scout appeared by the hunted brute, and to this it rapidly made its way. But now the baboons became aware of the scout as to the leopard, some by their great activity actually tearing him with their sharp teeth, and the greater number by their loud and angry yells and voices one another, and some could eat and drink too, while their companions maintained watch on the leopard.

During two days and a night the country for several miles along the course of these creatures was the scene of a fearful and strange pantomime, and several farmers were witnesses from a distance of portions of the drama described. They would not interfere, but watched the baboons method of administering justice.

Worn out with exhaustion and thirst, the leopard at length could totter on no further. Then to the ground at a point of the baboons, who, in spite of his claws and teeth, which were yet formidable, attacked him with their whole force, and tore him to pieces, while they themselves escaping with only a few severe scratches.

The victorious troops then returned rapidly to their stronghold, where they were welcomed by their females and young with choruses of loud and triumphant barks, which were continued during the greater part of the night, while for several days the excitement did not seem to quite down, but was shown by the unusual noises which proceeded from this curious colony.

Another curious baboon habit which is related by a credible witness.

Amidst the deeply wooded ravines of a range of mountains in the eastern frontier of the Cape of Good Hope a large colony of the pig-faced baboons were found. These creatures will feed there a safe resting-place for many generations to store and dangerous were the cliffs that no creature except a baboon could climb among them, and so the animals were safe and happy.

The traveler in that wild region would find his arrival announced from hill-top by a chorus of wild and hard-throated barks. To these sounds, human animals could be seen on the side of naturally formed walls of rock, standing and gesticulating at and threatening the solitary traveler who had intruded into this domain—a domain of which a king might be proud.

This part of Africa has been gifted with a love for climate, and the rocks are clothed with soft effects similar to those produced by quaffing Champagne. No wonder that the chameleon should find in this neighborhood a genial life, leisurely and to feed on air—for it has a glorious habit of to feed on the scented air of the Amatola Mountains.

Here are steep, rocky precipices; sheltered glen, where the wild fig-tree grows, in whose purple and crimson blossoms give a distinct coloring to the scene. It is also a favorite spot of mighty hills rolls, one after the other, far as the eye can reach, boundless and desolate, yet lovely in its magnificence. It is among these rocks and the gray vultures floats like a thistle-down high up in the clouds, and where the baboon roams through the air on his prey, and where the baboon roams peers at will, the legitimate and hereditary possessor of the soil.

Human-like almost in form, the baboon seems to have human in his passions, as the following anecdote will show.

Some miles from the Amatola, and separated from them by an intervening plain, was another rocky stronghold, in which another colony of baboons were located. These latter, to the inexperienced eye, showed no distinct peculiarities from their neighbors in the Amatola, yet there were men whose keen perception were able to discover distinct peculiarities between the two races, and to be able to tell which was an Amatola baboon and which a denizen of the Chumie.

The baboons themselves did not fraternize, and if by chance stray baboons from each colony met one another in their wanderings, a regular fight ensued.

When the sun sank beneath the Chumie Hills, the baboons from that region would sit on the most giddy precipices, and bark forth a defiance to the distant mountains. In that clear atmosphere sound travels a long distance, and is heard during a still evening at almost fabulous distances. The Amatola were then on the qui vive, and the baboons at one district were heard and replied to by the creatures some miles off, in the Amatola.

To the uninitiated these mere animal barks seemed to mean nothing; but to the keen ears and comprehensive senses of the baboons they conveyed the direst insults and most defiant challenges.

Human nature has its limits of endurance, and so has the baboon nature, after a particularly warm summer day, during which, probably, the creatures had become additionally heated, the evening challenges were given and answered with unusual vehemence. The moon rose bright and full, and the air was calm and lovely, and it seemed strange that all nature should not be at peace; but shrieks and barks and the fiercest oaths and precipices resounded with screams, barks, and fiend-like sounds, as though a legion of demons had broken loose and were fighting among themselves.

The hours these fearful sounds were heard, and the settlers then in their neighborhood listened with astonishment, not knowing whether these sounds were the expression of unusual force, or were the indicators of some convulsion of nature. Toward daybreak they gradually subsided, and men whose rest had been disturbed armed themselves and cautiously approached the scene of the night's battle.

The cause of the alarming disturbance was then manifest. The baboons of the Amatola had long borne the challenges and insults of their neighbors of the Chumie; they had listened to their taunts, and had burned with a desire for vengeance. At length an attack was organized, and on the night in question the male portion of the Amatola assembled the colony of the Chumie, and a fearful fight ensued.

The battle was fought of course in a singular and formidable; his muscular power is enormous, while the crushing power of his jaws is inferior only to that of the lion alone; when once he grips with his jaws, however, he can hold on, as it is said, with a vice. His better people have found to be all but it was clenched to be; and hence it is popular, and known well.

PAIN KILLER FROM 1840 1870

It is a very significant fact, that notwithstanding the many periods of TWENTY YEARS that the "PAIN KILLER" has been before the world, its popularity has not diminished, but on the contrary, it is called for it has steadily increased from the first discovery. And as no previous time has the demand for it been so great, or the quantity made been so large, as it is at this day. It is therefore people have found it to be all but it was clenched to be; and hence it is popular, and known well.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

The Subscriber, having located his Subscription-Book business in the office of HARPER & BROTHERS, is now prepared to offer better inducements than believed, than any publisher of subscription-books. The works for which his Agents are now canvassing are the following:

M'CLINTOCK & STRONG'S CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE. A work adapted to the wants of all classes, being a library in itself.

WOMAN'S RECORD; or, Biographical Sketches of Distinguished Women. By Mrs. S. J. HALE. With more than One Hundred Portraits. The interest that awakened in the public mind in regard to the rights, the duties, and the spheres of woman renders this a work to the liberal patronage of both sexes.

THE LAND AND THE BOOK; or, Biblical Illustrations drawn from the Manners and Customs, the Scenes and the Scenery of the Holy Land. By W. M. THOMSON, D.D., Twenty-five Years a Missionary in Syria and Palestine. With two elaborate Maps of Palestine, an accurate Plan of Jerusalem, and several hundred Engravings.

JESUS OF NAZARETH: His Life and Teachings. Illustrated by Reference to the Manners, Customs, Religious Rites, and Political Condition of the Times. A household book for every Christian family.

The above are all beautifully illustrated; and, being works of the highest merit, Agents may feel assured that in offering them for sale they are conferring a favor to the public and benefiting themselves.

Persons who wish to engage with us can register in it, and wanting business, will address, for full particulars,

A REPOSITORY OF

FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most rapid, and has received a welcome the most unanimous, that ever greeted a publication. Its merit and its claims upon family patronage are based upon the broad principle of Fashion in connection with a high literary standard. By a special arrangement, involving great expense, with the publishers of the BOUDOIR JOURNAL—the leading journal of fashion in Europe—its fashion-plates are published in New York simultaneously with their appearance in Berlin and Paris.

A large portion of the BAZAR is every week devoted to instructive and entertaining reading—matter—Stories, Poems, Sketches, Historical Sketches, and Gossip. The editorial articles are always spicy, and cover every topic of interest. No pains, no effort and no expense will be spared to consistently secure the daily journal the victory which it has won so rapidly and which it will still deserve.

Call paper Patterns of the beautiful Paris Costumes in HARPER'S BAZAR will be regularly engraved, graded to fit any figure from 30 to 42 inches bust measure, with the names and directions for putting together, or printed on each separate piece of the pattern, will be sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price. Twenty-five Cents and bust measure. The same patterns (each piece on a separate sheet) will be furnished, supplied with the entire set of nine sizes at $2 00. Thus every subscriber to the BAZAR can obtain, at a trifling cost, a perfect fit, and the use of Paper Patterns will end bad measurements.

In the BAZAR for April will be commenced "The Cryptogram," a serial story of thrilling interest, by the Author of "Lena Rivers" and "Dora Deane," &c., profusely illustrated.

Harper's Weekly.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and a commentary upon all the important events of the time. Due attention is also given to literary, political, and local interest. The best artists in the country are constantly employed to the important illustrations, and the Publishers are also largely indebted to photographers in all the principal cities of America, and the East for prompt and valuable contributions.

As an Literary Journal, HARPER'S WEEKLY is recognized as the only illustrated newspaper which has ever succeeded in establishing a literature having a claim to pre-eminence.

As a Family Journal of HARPER'S WEEKLY contributes one of its most prominent features. It includes weekly articles upon National Politics, Social Economics, and Current Topics.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

Harper's Magazine.

The JUNE Number began the Second Vol. of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. The publishers have succeeded beyond their most sanguine expectations in this enterprise—has been due to the popular character and variety of the contents. The aim and purpose of HARPER'S MAGAZINE for the future, as for past, the best literary contributions of English and American writers, to its profusely-illustrated articles of Travel and Exploration; to the pre-eminent authenticity and popular treatment of its papers upon scientific subjects, upon the mechanical improvements of the day, and upon current topics; and to the variety and lateness of its special Record of Contemporary History. The work is now one his been added, viz., the Monthly Gossip with Readers and Correspondents, which will make the Magazine more than ever a welcome guest to the leading constituency; and the Publishers are confident that the enlargement of the sphere and scope of the reading public they will be able to enhance even the present popularity of the work.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from fifty to one hundred per cent. more matter than any other periodical issued in the English language. Thus the ample space in the diagram of its Publication Office has been to treat fully of all the topics embraced in their plan.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, AUGUST 6, 1870.

SENTIMENTAL STATESMANSHIP.

THE recall of MR. MOTLEY from England is the real reasons for which are thus far withheld from the public—and the appointment of MR. FRELINGHUYSEN, which in itself is received with general favor, reopens a little the interest in the Alabama question. There has been, also, a brief synopsis published of correspondence between MR. MOTLEY and Lord Clarendon upon the subject. In this report MR. MOTLEY is represented as making a very wise remark to the British Foreign Secretary, a remark, indeed, which MR. EVARTS suggests and urges other American Minister must repeat to the British Government until some settlement is reached. The remark was, that the first step toward the establishment of friendly relations between the two governments is to see the case as we see it, and to understand the deep sense of wrong which we feel. This view of the subject is usually sneered at as sentimental diplomacy; and it is statistically said that nations don't pay damages for wounded sensibilities, but for merchandise illegally destroyed. MR. SUMNER has been reproached for treating the question sentimentally, and for a display of emotional statesmanship; and MR. MOTLEY is supposed to have sympathized with what is called the Senator's folly.

But what is derided as sentimental statesmanship is merely regard for the life of the feelings and passions are the real motives in human affairs. International differences of dollars may be compounded or forgiven. They are very trivial. But as a man thinketh, so is he. If one man attacks the child of another, the difficulty is not settled, nor the peace re-established because the assailant pays a fine for assault and battery. The real injury is not to the body of the victim, it is to the feelings of the parent. That law operates with the same force in international affairs. And it was the perception of this truth which led DR. FRANKLIN, one of the most practical of men, to suggest a purely sentimental clause in the treaty of peace between America and Great Britain which closed the Revolution. In a paper of hints as to what was advisable but not essential in such a treaty the Doctor proposed "some sort of acknowledgment in some public act of Parliament, or otherwise," of the British error "in distressing those countries so much." The English negotiator, who mentions the fact, adds: "A few words of that kind, the Doctor said, would do more good then people could imagine."

FOOT RICHARD was never more practical, nor more shrewd, than in this "sentimental" suggestion. It was not indeed adopted. Governments, we are told, can have no emotions. But that the Doctor was right, who denies? And was his proposition, if adopted, would have done good, who questions? That there would have been a very different feeling between the two countries, which might have avoided the jealousy of 1794, the war of 1812, and the alienation of 1861, is evident. Now, it is precisely in this spirit that MR. SUMNER made his famous speech. He demanded nothing. He said only, this is the case as we understand it. It has two aspects: one of pecuniary damage, the other of national feeling. The outcry was made because he was supposed to have demanded a pecuniary settlement of the feeling. But what he did demand was, first, recognition of the wrong—exactly what DR. FRANKLIN asked; and, second, a consideration of the national losses growing out of this wrong. The computation in money of such losses is indeed difficult; you do we believe that the country asks more than the recognition of the wrong. But whatever is asks, the question of a proper consideration is to be determined wholly by the purposes of a treaty.

What, then, is the real end to be sought in an Alabama treaty? Permanent peace and friendship between the two countries. Any other object is foolish. A treaty not inspired by that purpose would be only another source of discord. But does any body imagine that such an object can be attained without proper feeling? What was the moral of the rejection of the JOHNSTON treaty? As a method of ascertaining certain computable pecuniary losses and indemnifying the losers, it was a very good treaty. But under the circumstances it was a body without a soul. It was a monster, and instantly repelled. It lacked any provision whatever which bore in any degree upon the chief difficulty—upon the national sense of wrong. Great Britain says that we made the treaty. Technically we did; but actually MR. SEWARD made it, and he was not in sympathy with the country. Great Britain continues that, having rejected our own treaty, it certainly is not her place to propose another. Technically, again, this is true. But unless there is a statesmanship which can rise above technicalities, there will be no settlement except such as that in which PRUSSIA and FRANCE are now engaged. IN DR. FRANKLIN'S phrase, then, what is "advisable?"

Another treaty can, of course, be made providing for the settlement of claims and leaving the "wrong" untouched. The precedents established by Great Britain may remain unquestioned and our money bill be paid. Then what? Then the instant Great Britain is drawn into war, every one of these precedents will be turned against her as with fire. Such an arrangement, therefore, is no settlement. It can not secure the proper objects of a treaty between the two countries. And the government of Great Britain plainly does herself and the just purposes of a settlement the utmost wrong when she plants herself upon a purely technical position. She is not asked to go down upon her knees to cry peccavi. She is not asked to renounce the right which we ourselves claim, that the British President so strongly stated in his first annual Message to Congress, and in that upon the Cuban question—the right to maintain a clear independence for itself when to acknowledge belligerency. She is asked to consider whether she should not be willing to refer to arbitration the question whether the precedents established by her conduct during the war should be sustained as a part of international law. Are they, in fact, precedents by which she is willing to stand?

If the object of a treaty at the present time between the United States and Great Britain be not only to satisfy just pecuniary claims, but to establish good-will, it is mere folly to expect that it can be done by any merely economial manner and by a total disregard of feeling. The arrangement must have some reference to the real springs of human action. And what those are the dryest diplomatist knows.

THE WANTON WAR.

IT is not surprising that the Duke de Grammont, the French Foreign Minister, complained that the tone of the English press would produce uncomfortable irritation in France. The means, of course, in the French Government, which has precipitated a most monstrous and wanton war. It is natural that they should be able to such a government to hear the firm and indignant protest of the intelligence of other nations. It is no immediate and beneficial justification of the remark of M. THIERS: "Public opinion will turn against us; the journals of Europe will be against us." M. THIERS is an old journalist. He knows the real power of the press. He feels that a war condemned by its general voice is not likely to end glory. He sees only too clearly that no adequate response to the charge of France incalculable suffering, sorrow, and loss which are let loose upon Europe by the French declaration of war; and he knows that the Duke de Grammont who would make uncompromising hostility to Prussian ascendancy the spring of the French foreign policy.

France stands accused at the bar of civilization of renewing all the miseries of European war. What is her defense? It is to be found in her official statement of grievances, which are three: the French Embassador has been insulted; the Hohenzollern candidature compelled the withdrawal of France because the Spanish people compelled the withdrawal of PRINCE LEOPOLD's candidacy; and the King allowed the PRINCE to accept it for himself. The insult was the result of the fear of Prussian ascendency, which has been urged as the real justification of the French attack upon Austria in 1866. The insult pleads. And it is not mentioned because of the simple fact that the withdrawal of the PRINCE removed every cause for complaint. When the candidacy was abandoned, France had no more reason to attack Prussia than she had to attack Holland. Undoubtedly France wants the Rhenish frontier. But she did not dare gravely to allege her cupidity as a justification for a tremendous war. That pretext she pleads. And it is not mentioned because of the simple fact that the withdrawal of the Prince removed every cause for complaint. When the candidacy was abandoned, France had no more reason to attack Prussia than she had to attack Holland. Undoubtedly France wants the Rhenish frontier. But she did not dare gravely to allege her cupidity as a justification for a tremendous war. That pretext she pleads. And it is not mentioned because of the simple fact that the withdrawal of the Prince removed every cause for complaint. She believed herself strong enough to break the peace of Europe in the hope of acquiring more territory in the universal tumult, ravage, anguish, and desolation. The hope of civilization must be that such a crime may be punished as it deserves. No wonder that the old German love of father-land bursts into a flame in the hearts of Germans beyond the sea; nor that an English journal exclaims that the BONAPARTES have exhausted Heaven's patience!

Of the issue of a struggle between two nations so military and so inflamed, is, it course, beyond human speculation. It is certain that the war continues, that feelings long slumbering will not awake. The memories of the days when the value of the Rhine Provinces to England Germany in blood will kindle every heart in that great land, so that its sternly disciplined martial valor will be backed by a boundless enthusiasm. Indeed, the war which LOUIS NAPOLEON hopes will frustrate the designs of BISMARCK, and humiliate their author, will only further his policy. For his great object, which is actual German unity, will be promoted much more readily in war than in peace. Bavaria and Hanover may be jealous of Prussia; but Bavaria and Hanover are Germans, and they will fight to the last to prevent a French victory over Germans upon German soil. Community of hopes and perils and struggles, of reverses and successes, will weld them all the more closely, as the common fortunes of our Revolution knit the colonies into a nation.

The other powers will prefer absolute neutrality. If they must take part, Russia and England would gravitate toward Prussia. German Austria could not easily see Frenchmen humbling Germans. The King of Italy is related to the possible heir of the French empire, and the old tyranny of Austria made the Germans cursed—audaces Tedeschi—in the Italian mind. As for Spain, her own independence is Prussia, and has not forgotten Villafranca. It certainly could not join heartily with Austria or France. Spain must desire to keep wholly out of the fray. Denmark would gladly see Prussia humbled. Sweden wants no war. It is, indeed, easy to see that such a maelstrom as this war may suck in the most reluctant victims. But it is to be hoped that the pretext of foreign intervention for a war so wickedly provoked by France may be steady and strong enough to confine it to the original belligerents, and to hasten the restoration of a peace so wantonly disturbed.

A SIGN OF THE TIMES.

THE prompt refusal of the Republican majority in Congress to accept the recommendation of the President to allow the purchase of foreign vessels for the foreign trade of the country during a limited time is of great political significance. That at a moment when the shipping interest is prostrated, and the imminence of a war, that may be of European extent opens the amplest opportunities for American commercial enterprise, a Republican majority should refuse to co-operate with a Republican President, shows that the question involved is powerful enough to destroy party unity; that is to say, it has already divided the party, and has become, therefore, an immediate practical issue.

Under any present tariff building ships is a ruinous business. Suddenly we want great numbers of ships immediately. They can be bought cheaply in Europe, and in a few days, then, to-day, says the President to his party in Congress, and turn them to account, even if we again destroy to buy them to-morrow. And his party divides. A portion of it wishes to follow his advice. The other portion wishes to have no ships that we do not build ourselves. But meanwhile we build no ships. The carrying trade which founded our commercial prosperity speaks to us again, and in vain. We swing our feet, and done in our silent and crumbling ship-yards, and drowsily reply that we will somewhere build ships at home. And, meanwhile, English and other foreign ships triumphantly carry off the advantage that we disdain.

This means that the question of protection, free trade, revenue tariff—whatever we may choose to call it—has become a cardinal point in practical politics. We have always insisted that issues can not be arbitrarily chosen. They arise from the natural development. They assert themselves; and they assert themselves precisely in this manner, by showing that they are strongest in the prevailing party traditions. The experience of this session has shown that a House with a large Republican majority might be found to join the next Congress which should not contain a single member that would support the recommendations of the Republican Administration. In the House which has just adjourned there were no more positive Republicans than MESSRS. BLAIR, KELLEY, MORRILL, and MCCULLOCH. Yet had all the other Republican members agreed with them the final and urgent recommendation of the Republican President would not have received a single Republican vote.

This most important fact must not be forgotten in the preparations for the next Congress. It is for every reason connected with the power and permanence of the party desirable that the two parties whose conventions should express themselves distinctly upon this subject, which the action of Congress proves is now one of paramount importance. No party can divide upon such questions and retain its ascendency. If half the party in Congress intend to support the President when he opposes him, the party fate is foreshadowed in that of the Kilkenny cats. The arbitrary will of the President is not, indeed, to be the law of the party; on the contrary, the President has declared that the will of the people shall be his law. But how can he determine what that will is, if the representatives of the majority do not agree? Unanimity in essentials is the vital condition of the party association, and that must be the objective point of the Republican party at the Congressional elections.

PRÉVOST-PARADOL.

THE kindly feeling that welcomed M. PRÉVOST-PARADOL to this country was deepened by the circumstances under which he began his mission, and his made his sudden and tragical death peculiarly mournful. He was the first victim of the war; and, although personally little known to us, there will be none likely to be more lamented in the United States. M. PRÉVOST-PARADOL had made his election between the empire with liberal guarantees of liberty as it offered, and the chances of RÉPUBLIQUE and a red revolution. It was a sorry alternative, and, in taking his part, a mind so acute, a temperament so sensitive, a wit so subtle, must have been sorely tried. Arriving in a foreign country with which he had profound sympathy, and charged with grave duties in which he was wholly inexperienced, physical prostration by a sea voyage, and the exhausting climate, he learned, as he landed, that he was the representative of a man whose crime in plunging the country into war had not only covered him with deeper odium in the American mind, but must also have more clearly revealed to the Minister the nature of the regime he had sustained at the expense, as it had unjustly seemed to many, of personal honor. Doubtless he wished to leave the country right, and justified himself, while he knew that others could not justify him—a thought that he could not have. His mind wavered. He wrote pathetically, "Je me tue," and all was over.

We speak elsewhere of his one official act; for such we may call his unauthorized declaration to the Secretary of State. It showed a readiness to assume responsibility, which is of the highest value in a Minister under such circumstances; and it showed also a determination that, so far as depended upon him, his country should not lag behind any other in the humane alleviations of war. It was his sole act as the Minister of France in America, and it was one to be greatly remembered by those who loved him. No European Minister ever came among us with fairer promise or brighter hopes; and FRANCE has scarcely long among her best sons before she finds one to whom the American heart will welcome as it welcomed PRÉVOST-PARADOL.

UNDUE HASTE.

IT was obvious that President GRANT's Cuban Message would be carefully scanned in England in the most unfair justification of meaning might offer for the conduct of the British Government toward the United States during the rebellion. And it is not worth while to suffer any misapprehension or misstatement of the British press to gain strength by want of exposure of its falsity.

The Pall Mall Gazette praises the Message. It quotes the President's remark that, "The question of belligerency is one of fact, to be decided by sympathy for or prejudice against either party." And again, "Fighting, though fierce and persistent, does not constitute public war. There must be military forces acting in accordance with the rules and customs of war; flags of truce, cartels, exchange of prisoners." The Gazette then politely says, as if it settled the question of the British declaration in 1861: "Whether the recognition conferred on the existence of these conditions was certainly not wanting in the case of the civil war."

Undoubtedly these conditions did exist during our civil war. But the question is, did they exist when the British Government issued its proclamation of belligerent rights in the rebellion? Had there been that array of military forces acting in accordance with the rules and customs of war, those cartels, those exchanges of prisoners, which, beside mere fighting, are essential to the idea of war? This question is answered by the facts. The complaint of MR. FISH, in his note of September last recapitulating the circumstances, is simply "undue haste." Was there haste, or was there not? If there was, the Pall Mall Gazette labors in vain to justify the British action by the PRESIDENT'S principles.

Now the facts are that, on the 6th of May, LORD RUSSELL stated in Parliament that the Government had consulted the law officers, and had decided that "the Southern Confederacy, according to the principles which seem to them to be just principles, must be treated as belligerents." The law officers advised no action. They said only that the Government was "entitled" to consider belligerency if it desired. When LORD RUSSELL announced the decision the news of the battles south upon Fort Sumter was not ten days old in England. No other act that had the least appearance of a warlike character in the United States Government; and the new American Minister, specially charged to communicate the policy of the United States Government, had not yet arrived. On the 11th of May the British Government was officially informed of President LINCOLN's proclamation of blockade; and on the 13th of May the Queen's proclamation, conceding belligerency, issued. Thus, five days before the British Government had any official knowledge of the fact by which that proclamation is now justified it had resolved to issue it. MR. FISH complained of "undue haste." Could words be more exactly used?

The conditions which the Pall Mall Gazette quotes from President GRANT, as sanctioning a concession of belligerency, did not exist at the time Great Britain conceded belligerency to the rebels. Lord Clarendon, with the same purpose as that of the Pall Mall Gazette, cited in his reply to MR. FISH, as facts showing that there was war, the President's summons of the 3d of May for more troops; various captures of vessels at sea—some, which he mentions, as late as the 15th of May; the declaration of the efficiency of the Carolina blockade; and the assertion of Mr. SEWARD, of the 4th of May, that it was "open, flagrant, deadly war." Perhaps it was. But the British Government knew nothing of all these things on the 6th of May. The grounds of its justification are wholly an after-thought. The very paragraph with which the Pall Mall Gazette seizes upon the President's words shows its consciousness of the necessity of defense, while the attempt merely reveals its inability to offer any that has not been riddled by the facts.

VATICAN THUNDER.

The adoption of the dogma of Papal Infallibility by the Œcumenical Council has excited scarcely a remark. The Council was called for that purpose, and it has done what was expected. It is, indeed, a subject of much more importance to the members of the Pope's Church than to any body else. There is something purely amusing and partly humiliating to a spectator in the solemn declaration by four hundred and fifty very fallible gentlemen that a certain other gentleman is infallible. For of all qualities that might be supposed to establish themselves infallibility is the chief. To decide by the majority vote is an exquisite comedy. To suppose that the vote confers infallibility is ludicrous. To suppose that it merely recognizes a fact is to defy history. The significance of the declaration is that the Jesuit element which controls the Roman Church finds it convenient.

We say that it chiefly concerns the members of that Church because the only protests against it have proceeded from eminent Roman Catholics. The more intelligent Roman Churchmen see that nothing can be gained by asserting something which is already universally believed by all those whom the assertion can be supposed to influence; while it compels those whom it can not influence to a positive dissent. The mass of the members of the Roman Church already practically believe in the infallibility of the Pope. Their most familiar acts of faith are charged with the absurdity of such a belief, and their attention drawn to the irreligious conduct of certain popes, in the vain hope that Pope is fallible, but as Pope he is infallible! That those who use this argument have any clear idea of what it means can not be supposed. But it is, nevertheless, a very common assertion.

The four hundred and fifty gentlemen in Rome who have just voted that the Pope is infallible seek, indeed, to limit the infallibility in a similar way. They confine it chiefly to certain abstract religious bounds, because they see the risk of empowering any ignorant or foolish or fanatical man, such as the Pope generally is, to declare absolutely, for instance, what is essential to salvation. They know that such a man might declare something which mankind would presently disprove. He might assert that to be true, and faith in it indispensable to salvation, which would presently be universally shown to be false. Therefore they do not say that if the Pope alleges that two and two make five they do so. They give him no authority to pronounce upon points cognizable by experience or science, but only upon those which are purely speculative, and of which, as no human being can possibly know any thing, he may safely make such statements as he chooses. Thus a pope may proclaim that one has to believe this or that will damn a soul eternally. The damnation can not be disproved, and, therefore, infallibility is in no danger. To this extent, therefore, the assumption is safe.

But as establishing and confirming the Jesuit supremacy in the Roman Church the decree is significant. It tends to concentrate and strengthen ecclesiastical action. The Council has declared very generally the Church authority against liberty and toleration. It has specified the points of its hostility. It has resolved that the Roman Church shall oppose the progress of civilization. The liberal and humanizing tendencies of Churchmen like MONTALEMBERT and HUSSEY, and of the Congress of Catholics, is utterly rejects. It defies science and the human mind. What then? "Mr. STEVENSON, suppose your chronicle at full speed, and proceed a cow upon the track. What then?" "So much the worse for the cow!" replied Mr. STEVENSON.

HUMANITY IN WAR.

The telegram from Count BISMARCK to the Prussian Minister at Washington,* Private property on the high seas will be exempt from seizure, without regard to reciprocity," is a significant sign of the progress of civilization. This protection transcends that of the Treaty of Paris, to which Prussia was a party. The Treaty of Paris abolished privateering, and made neutral goods safe under an enemy's flag, and enemy's goods safe under a neutral flag. The United States, however, declined to assent to the treaty, because the abolition of privateering was necessarily perilous to a great commercial nation without an ample navy. But they were willing to assent upon condition of the absolute freedom of the private property of a belligerent from seizure by the public armed vessels of the enemy.

This freedom, which is beyond that secured by the Treaty of Paris, is now conceded by Prussia. The security of private property "without regard to reciprocity" means the property of a belligerent, not contraband, under the enemy's flag. It is what Mr. MARCY demanded of the Congress of Paris. Now, Prussia will make all private property exempt from capture at sea we will cease privateering." Prussia declares the immunity of all merchant ships in a lawful trade. It is an immense progress. Yet it is strictly logical. A distinguished French statesman says: "No one can but admit that private property which is free even in the enemy's land ought to be still invaded by us on your victorious, and invested with the right of conquest, can be justly taken and plundered on the sea—on that element, that is free, which is neither friendly nor hostile territory."

It is interesting, at this time, to recall that, in the temporary treaty of 1785 between the United States and Prussia, which was drawn up by Dr. FRANKLIN, the contracting powers promised that in privateer-war against each other they should still further, engaged that all merchant vessels of either country, employed in regular commerce, should be unmolested on the high seas. These were signs of the constant tendency of international law upon the subject. It is a tendency founded upon reason and humanity, rather than upon mere force. The rights of neutral trade—to say nothing of the peaceful commerce of belligerents—have been more generally secured. The old rule, with exceptions and variations, was the will of the strongest maritime power. It was, in effect, that neutral goods are safe and enemy's goods unsafe under any flag. The present general rule, under the Treaty of Paris, is, that free goods make free goods. The rule virtually laid down by Prussia, in COUNT BISMARCK'S dispatch, is, that enemy's goods are free at sea.

Upon hearing of this humane measure of Prussia, M. PREVOST-PARADOL, the lamented French Minister, immediately sent word to the Secretary of State and assured him that France would exempt from seizure at sea all private property, without regard to flag. He said that he had no instructions, but he knew that France would not do less than Prussia. It is what an admirable conference of words with M. PREVOST-PARADOL, and showed him to have the readiness and boldness of a skillful diplomatist. With a rule of humanity more full and comprehensive of Prussia, with a small navy, than for France, with her powerful fleet. But M. PREVOST-PARADOL probably knew that the world was changing. The feeling of this country is evidently not friendly to France in the war, and if she should seize less ingenuous than the Prussian rule would be the rights of neutrals, that feeling would become even more pronounced. The action of the French Minister, therefore, was ingenuous, and will, unquestionably, be approved by his Government, unless it had issued contrary orders.

These are humane facts that relieve the dense gloom of the impending conflict. Not less significant of a spirit of humanity growing in the code of international warfare is the remark of SECRETARY FISH, that were he a merchant he should not think it worth while to insure against the risk of a war risk. In older times a war between maritime powers imperiled all peaceful commerce. Now, at best peaceful commerce gives laws to war.

MARRIED WOMEN IN AMERICA AND ENGLAND.

It is curious that, while in England the House of Lords refuses to give to married women the control of their own separate property, in the United States seven excellent members of Congress propose not to intrust them with a voice in the disposition of their property. Would not these good ladies feel still more relieved if Congress should forbid their holding or acquiring any property? For they are aware, of course, that the giving and the receiving property go together. If the public money is squandered it is generally because the tax-payers do not protest. And if they do not protest it is because they dislike the trouble of protesting, they certainly offer good reason for suspecting that they could be far less grateful. The argument of the ladies—which suggests the belief that it proceeds from their husbands—over shoots the mark. For if, as their petition alleges, because of many reasons, including that of the higher sphere," which is more familiar than flexible, it is improper that women should be allowed to enjoy the just responsibilities of property, it is plainly improper that they should be allowed to own property.

We must assume, therefore, that these American married women approve the refusal of the House of Lords to give English married women the control of their property as a step at least in the right direction. We beg any one of the excellent ladies who may chance to read these words to read also the story of Hester Detbridge in MRS. GASKELL'S "Mary Barton." It is now published, and they will see the necessary consequences of the system which springs naturally from their principle. Perhaps upon reflection they will admit that it can not be for the advantage of the state that half of the citizens should abdicate their share of the responsibility, or be deprived of it by the other half; and that the interests of the working-women of the country, for which these good ladies profess a profound concern, can not be promoted by those who are in favor of their property being taken from them without their consent. Nor, because these worthy ladies are unwilling to bear their share of the fair duty of every member of society, are we either why they should request or Congress resolve that other equally worthy ladies who do not agree with them should be prevented from doing their duty.

PERSONAL GOVERNMENT.

THOUGHTFUL Frenchmen probably now see a peculiar disadvantage in the personal government which, under changed conditions, still prevails in France. Except for the personal feeling of LOUIS NAPOLEON it is very doubtful if war would have been declared against Prussia. The Corps Legislatif did what it knew the Emperor wished to do. The Foreign Minister spoke for the Emperor, without knowing what the Prussian policy would be. But if the war project had been laid before an assembly honestly elected by the people, an assembly acting without fear of the Emperor, it is not at all certain that it would not have voted with M. THIERS rather than with M. ROUHER, and decided that France did not wish to go to war because the French Minister had insulted the King of Prussia. Indeed that Minister, a gentleman personally versed in diplomatic etiquette, would not have violated the official proprieties but for his subservience to the imperial will. Nothing more plainly shows the mendacity of the Ollivier era in the government of France than the war with Prussia. It is a move in LOUIS NAPOLEON'S game with Bismarck. But, like all his moves, it is, as THIERS called it, a blunder.

Undoubtedly there is popular enthusiasm for the war. Frenchmen and Prussians do not love each other. They are each proud in their own way. They each profess to love liberty. Perhaps the French are more passionate; the Prussians more obstinate. They are very near, as the saying is, "to fight a well known foe, doth wash the city of Cologne," but also it washes much shore upon the French side which is yet not France. Therefore a good excuse to fight Prussia would undoubtedly have been sought even by a government of the people. But no such excuse as the present would probably ever have been suggested except by a personal government. And as civilization advances merely the interests of the people will more declares war." If it had provided that the representatives of the people declare war, the world would have been spared the ghastly spectacle it is about to behold.

A SWEET SIGHT.

WHO would believe that "corruptionists of the Ring," who perpetrate "shameless and damning frauds" would give a great city a "good government?" And how weighty the denunciations of fraud against opponents are when they proceed from corruptionists of its own party!

Last summer the World said that it had seen

"By what shameless and cunning frauds each corruptionists of the Ring as WILLIAM M. TWEED and WILLIAM T. SWEENY have become the lawful rightful rule of the electors of HOLLAND SWEENY."

This summer the World says:

"The amount of work which Mr. TWEED, Mr. HALL, and Mr. COZZENS are each turning out and going through with in the most workmanlike manner is perfectly astonishing. It is, in fact, a marvel how they get through it all, hood as they are all the time, night and day, with scores of applicants for office. But the energy which they exhibit, and the close attention which each pays to the details of every thing he undertakes, shows that they are, as far as it lies within their power, determined to give the city a good government, and redeem their promises. At any rate, they are making all departments efficient, and before one year rolls around the public will begin to see the beneficial effects of the change in our city government."

We have beautiful to see brethren dwelling together in unity!

RIGHTS OF RAILWAY PASSENGERS.

MR. SMITH puts his point vigorously:

"Mr. ERICSON, of Connecticut, a passenger has been forcibly put to the effort to protect passengers from abuse, etc., at the hands of railroad monopolists. I take the liberty of making a suggestion, and hope that you will think the point of sufficient importance to attract your attention.

"It is this: All carriers of passengers should, by legislative enactment, be made subject to the same restrictions, penalties, and rules that govern common carriers.

"As the law now stands, a carrier of freight and passengers is obliged to see more care in the transportation of a box of cobble-stones or straw than a car of human beings.

"In the former case he is answerable for every damage except that done by the act of God and national enemies: in the latter, only for negligence—which can never be proved.

"Yours, etc., JOHN SMITH."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

A NEW YORK "repeater" was recently convicted on the charge of attempting to vote in another name last May, and sentenced by Judge Barnard to two years' imprisonment.

The conductor and engineer of the accommodation train, and the conductor of the mail train, on the New Hampshire Northern Railroad, have been indicted for manslaughter, in causing the death of the engineer of the mail train in the collision on that road July 13.

The Rev. Dr. ADAMS, pastor of the Church Temple of Peace, Philadelphia, has been appointed by the Executive Committee of the brotherhood of Indian Reformers, a call for a convention of the "Irish nationalists of America, irrespective of past differences or organizations," to be held in Chicago, August 15, in Cincinnati, and such measures as will promote the cause of Irish independence.

Our Canadian friends recently undertook to enforce the fishery laws, and with a praiseworthy feeling for pleasure among their toast, and actually seized boats and tackle from Yankee fishermen. The United States Government, however, take a more sensible view of the matter, and, while they will not surrender any of the commercial privileges, the Canadian penalties remain will be forwarded if applied for, which will relieve the hearty pleasure parties against annoyance.

Lady Franklin has been in conference with Captain C. F. HALL in Washington, and proposes to go to the Arctic Ocean. She still hopes to obtain more definite intelligence respecting the death of her husband.

The provisions of the postal convention, by which a uniform rate of postage on letters and inland, are in operative, at present, in consequence of the French Government having not all mail matter from the United States and countries beyond will be sent by closed mail via Great Britain, as has been established for that class of communication.

Upon application for artificial limbs by officers and soldiers, wounded in the service of the United States, orders will be given by the Surgeon-General at Washington upon such application, directing that the artificial limb tends to furnish good and satisfactory limbs without extra charge to the soldier, and authorization to and from the place of fitting the limb will also be furnished.

The Indian war has not interfere progress, if the authority be sanctioned upon the Pacific railroad, which has been set apart from them to furnish employment and how to fill the sell, and then return them to their tribes, with such implements as may be necessary for farming. In this manner he thinks the Indians can be civilized.

It is stated that M. Trellland, the present French Minister to the United States, will be accredited as the successor of M. Prevost-Paradol.

The Japanese Embassy has arrived at Prescott, Arizona, and assumed command of the Department. His first order was to establish a military post at the Moqui Indians as hostile. The reports from the Territory in reference to the crops are looking very favorable.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE London Times of July 28 publishes a projected treaty submitted by France to the Prussian Government, which was rejected by Prussia. The terms of the proposed treaty are as follows:

The preamble sets forth that the King of Prussia and the Emperor of the French, desiring to remove all obstacle or friendship between the two governments and nations, etc., have cordially conclude the following:

In the first article, Napoleon admits and recognizes the acquisitions of Prussia from Austria.

In the second, the Prussian King engages to facilitate the French annexation of Luxemburg.

In the third, the Emperor acquiesces in the union of the North German Confederation with the South States.

In the fourth, France finally if necessary to absorb the Prussian army in the event of a general war.

The fifth article is the usual one of offensive and defensive alliance between the two nations.

Up to the time of the correspondence no engagement has taken place between the two armies of Marshal Bazaine and the Prince Frederick Charles upon Sarlouis crossed the French border to make a reconnoissance in the direction of Metz. After proceeding a short distance they met a troop of French chasseurs, who fired on them, and a brief skirmish ensued with a loss of several killed. French troops have also made a reconnoissance in the direction of Saarbruck.

The telegraphic war sent by France to Prussia declares that the Emperor of the French was obliged to consider the proposition to elevate a Prince Prussia to the throne of Spain as an attack on the security of France; that he decided to ask Prussia about it; that the scheme, which Prussia refused to do, receiving her refusal in a manner by circumstances which that the Emperor was forced to consider this determination as a menace, preparing to France and Prussia, and the Hohenzollern, and, particularly, as it was rendered the more threatening by the communications which, according to the Cabinets of Europe, giving an account of the refusal of Prussia to the French Ambassador. The telegram concludes:

"The French Government, therefore, is taking steps to secure its rights in honor and dignity, and having adopted all measures which the circumstances require, is determined to defend, if need be, with France."

The Italian Government has issued a proclamation of the Italian troops from Rome, and the Papal Chamberg are to the effect that Austria and Russia will protect the Pope.

General Ortolle is said to have left Rome for Florence. General Dumont of Prussia was never better prepared for war. The Crown Prince of Prussia and Prince William will command the South German armies. Prince Frederick Charles will command the army on the North.

Several large Fenian demonstrations in favor of the French have taken place in Ireland.

The Pope has several times declared and reaffirmed, the news of the Pekin massacre at length appears to have been true. The full details of the horrible occurrences have been received in London, and the first accounts, it is said, were not exaggerated. The Chinese authorities at Pekin have refused to punish the ringleaders or persons were burned to death in the houses destroyed.

The dogma of Infallibility was promulgated on the 18th of July by the Pope, with imposing ceremonies. The decree was received with very general dissent all over Europe. The press in Catholic Spain ridicule the new doctrine. The Pope of the distinguished historian, HENRY MARTIN, published an article in the Siecle, in which France is urged to take up arms "against the ground" that the extravagant pretensions of the Pope are a menace to the liberties of Europe. The Pope is mediated with new promulgation of the dogma, and the prelates hastened their departure from Rome. It is said that the Pope is in fear of his life, "surrounded by bands, and leave as sheep—will shorn." A pamphlet has been issued in Rome, ascribed to Archbishop Dechick, of St. Louis, with the title, "What has Passed the Council." It is said to be a somewhat sensational, but formal complaint was lodged against it.

In the French High Court, at Blois, July 19, a motion for a postponement, on account of the approach of the war, of the trial of the Orleanist Princes, was refused, and the trial was proceeded with. Baron Rothschild, who was drawn on the jury, failed to appear, and a fine of 900 francs was imposed on him.

It has been reported that the Cuban volunteers in Havana refused to command the power of the citizens of that place, and that the ladies in the city were obliged to take up the arms in the chaingang. Advices from the court dispatch from Havana pronounces the story of the volunteers refusing, and asserts that nothing of the kind has occurred.

THE STORY OF A SHIPWRECK.

CHAPTER VIII.

Destitution and Despondency.—Migration of Seals. Gathering Mussels at Low Tide.—An Earthquake Shock.—The Beginning of Winter.—The Contest in the Chasm.—The Return by Night.

In the mean time, while the long and tedious operation of making shoes, described in the preceding chapter, was going on, the autumn and early winter months were passing away, bringing with them nothing but hope deferred. The weather became almost continually stormy. Sometimes for a fortnight the sun was not seen. This gloomy aspect of the skies added a deeper tinge to the despondency which was gradually gaining possession of the spirits of the men. Their health began to suffer seriously from the effects of their unwholesome food, their severe exposures, and their incessant mental anxiety. In all of them the operation of these causes began in the end to produce a morbid condition of the nervous system, which caused them great distress and suffering. Sights and sounds which, under ordinary circumstances, would have been regarded with indifference, produced indescribable but irresistible emotions of gloom, and even of terror. The noise of the surf rolling in continually upon the shore, and the perpetual roaring of the wind among the trees, became almost insupportable. They seemed like demoniac voices incessantly calling to the wretched outcasts, and installing them with the hopelessness of their cruel destiny. In a word, they were on the verge of insanity.

Fortunately for them, they were aroused from this condition of despondency and gloom by a phenomenon which suddenly appeared and strongly attracted their attention; which, by the surprise and wonder which it awakened, turned the current of their thoughts. They observed, in the midst of the calm, an unusual agitation of the waters of the bay, at first without apparent cause. They soon found, however, that the commotion was caused by a multitude of seals, swimming about hither and thither, and increasing in numbers every moment. They were at first overjoyed at this sight, thinking that now they should be provided with an abundant supply of food. But their joy was soon turned into alarm at finding that this extraordinary concourse was the gathering of the seals of that vicinity for their annual migration. The whole school in a short time proceeded in a body down the bay, leaving the men in dismay at what seemed to be the final loss of their only resource for food during the winter that was coming on.

Their supplies of food were chiefly confined, after this, to the occasional captures which they could make among the few seals which had been left behind in the migration of the main body, and to the half salted, half smoke-dried meat which they had preserved. They found it necessary at once to put themselves upon a daily allowance, though they eked out their scanty fare to some extent by gathering mussels among the rocks along the shore when the tide was low. It is not wonderful that under these circumstances their health began seriously to suffer, and their spirits became more and more depressed. Mr. Raynal says that nothing but their resolution in keeping themselves incessantly busy saved them from sinking into utter despair.

Perhaps the gloomiest and most sorrowful and despairing night that they passed during this time of their sorest trial was a short time after this, when they were all suddenly aroused from their slumbers by the shock of an earthquake. The shock was not very severe; but it is not difficult to imagine how terrible the effect of being aroused out of sleep at midnight by such an alarm must have been upon minds so morbidly sensitive as theirs had become.

The shock was but momentary, but, while it lasted, was attended by the usual rumbling sounds, and by the shaking of the cabin, and the rattling of every thing contained in it. Some brands were even rolled out from the fire upon the floor, so that they had to spring out of bed to save their cabin from a conflagration. In ten or fifteen seconds, however, the commotion died away, but the men were too much oppressed with the sense of awe and solemnity which it had inspired to return to their beds. They gathered in a circle around the fire, and Captain Musgrave, to cheer and comfort them, took the Bible and read passages from it here and there. He selected such as referred to the goodness and mercy of God, and the watchful providence which He exercises over all His creatures, even the most lowly, and the special regard that He felt for man, whom He had created above all the rest of His creatures, and whom He loved with the love of a father for his children.

These gracious words cheered and comforted the men very much. They listened to the reading with the most devout and solemn attention.

The men had now given up all hope of being rescued that season, for the winter had fairly set in. When, however, they had passed the solstice, and the sun began to return toward the south, and the days began to lengthen, the extreme depression of their spirits began to be somewhat lightened, aided by the effect of constant employment during the day, and by the occupation of mind afforded by the evening school, which was still regularly continued. The work connected with the operation of tanning the leather and making the shoes gave them all much employment; and when the weather allowed they went on hunting expeditions after seals; for, in the migration, many, it seems, had been left behind. Among the rest, Old Tom remained, and the men encountered him at his old abode not long after the others went away. This happened one day when, after a long storm, the wind had subsided, and the sea was comparatively calm, they set out on an excursion in their boat to the western branch of the bay, in hopes of finding some remaining seal. They were all sick and weary, and could advance only slowly and with difficulty, and were obliged to stop often to rest.

At one of these stoppings, while Aleck was fastening the boat to a point of the rock, Captain Musgrave called to them to listen. He heard, he thought, something like a low, muttered growl above them.

The men seized their arms—Mr. Raynal his gun and the others their clubs—and climbed up the rocks. There they found Old Tom, and two females with him as old as himself. It seemed that they were too feeble to accompany the rest in their migration, and had concluded to remain, in their old age, at their summer home, leaving the younger ones to incur the fatigue and danger of seeking a change of climate. Old Tom seemed to recognize his visitors, having encountered them several times before, and he came forward to meet them growling. The men seemed to feel quite a sentiment of compassion for this old patriarch and his wives in their solitude and isolation, and would gladly have spared their lives. But their necessities were imperious. They killed all three of them, put their carcasses into the bottom of the boat, and returned to their camp, with hearts much lightened at having obtained a supply of even such food. They reached Epigwait at four o'clock, but it was so near the time of the winter solstice that it was dark before they arrived.

When the supply thus obtained was exhausted Aleck went off one day on foot along the coast to the northward to see what he could find. The others had little expectation that he would meet with any success, but, to their great surprise and joy, in about an hour they saw him coming in sight, among the rocks, bearing a heavy burden on his back. They ran to meet him, and were overjoyed to find that it was a young seal that he was bringing. He had found it with its mother on the shore, and had killed them both.

After relieving Aleck of his burden the whole party set out to bring in the carcass of the mother. They all went on together for some distance, and then Mr. Raynal and George separated from the rest to go through the thickets a little way inland, in order to avoid a place near the shore which was encumbered with sharp rocks, rendered dangerous by wet sea-weed clinging to them. Pretty soon they came to a brook which issued from a deep chasm. This chasm was about six feet wide and thirty feet deep. The water of the brook, on issuing from it, spread itself out over the level ground toward the shore and formed a bog difficult to pass.

A remarkable peculiarity of this chasm was that it was closed over at the surface of the ground above, for about one hundred feet, by the roots of trees and vines and mosses, and other creeping forms of vegetation, which had reached across it and grown so thick as to form a bed sufficiently dense at a certain part to enable a person to cross the chasm upon it as by a bridge. It was, in fact, a natural bridge formed by the luxuriance of the vegetation.

Mr. Raynal and George, in making their way through the thickets, came to this spot, climbing as they advanced over the fallen trees, and pushing aside the vines and bushes. Suddenly, they heard a rustling among the leaves and branches not far from them, and, instantly advancing, saw a seal. They immediately set off in pursuit of him. Several times Mr. Raynal was on the point of reaching him with his club, but, being so much impeded in his progress by the difficulties of the way, the seal always got off. In two minutes more he heard a crash, followed by a sound like the fall of a heavy body. The seal had leaped through the bridge of roots and moss, and tumbled into the chasm below. Mr. Raynal, being close behind him, came very near falling through too.

He immediately called to George to run down and endeavor to intercept the seal before the brook issued from the chasm, to prevent the seal from escaping into the sea. He himself resolved to follow the seal, by hanging his club to his back by the cord which was attached to the end of it, in order to get his way through an opening in the covering of the fissure, and lowered himself down by means of the roots and vines hanging by the side of it. He could not reach the bottom, and then let himself drop to the ground. When he had thus reached the bottom he found himself in a dark tunnel, as it were, for the chasm was so densely covered by the vegetation above that the light was almost entirely excluded.

He groped his way along in the direction which the seal had taken, feeling his way by the roots and vines hanging from the walls, and walking in the ice-cold water of the brook. As he advanced, and his eyes became accustomed to the darkness, he could see his companion, but before long he arrived at a place where the shrubs and roots from the sides, and the long vines and creepers trailing down from above, almost closed the passage. He made his way through these, and found himself in a hall which seemed a dark cavern. There was a small opening in the thickets which closed the passage at the lower end, through which he could look out toward the sea. Near this opening was the seal, motionless. He had come upon it before George watching to intercept him at the exit from the chasm, and he stopped, as it seemed, to consider what was best for him to do.

As soon as he saw Mr. Raynal and perceived that he was there, he hastened in between his deadly foes, without any way of escape, he seemed to grow desperate. He began to advance at once toward Mr. Raynal, with the wild grunt of rage and defiance. There was just light enough for Mr. Raynal to observe this much of the scene, and he waited for his adversary with his club raised in the air, ready to strike. His situation was very critical, for he knew well the strength and the obscurity, in bringing down the club, he should miss its mark, or even fail to give an effectual blow, he would be himself in the power of the ferocious animal. "Now here he is," said Mr. Raynal, concluding the sentence as the seal came reach. "Down comes my club upon his head. He drops, stunned. He beats the ground a moment with his paddles, and dies."

Mr. Raynal rolled the carcass into the brook, in order to lighten it in some degree for the passage, and dragged it in this way to the outlet of the cavern. There he found George, who aided him in forcing it through its opening, which was, however, so narrow that he himself, in following, was obliged to creep on his hands and knees through the water. The seal was then cut up into quarters, and each man taking two, they conveyed him home.

They found on their arrival at the cabin that the other seal had not returned. Harry had left their lantern—one which they had procured with the other articles that they had saved from the ship—and went in pursuit of them. He had recollected that they had gone to bring home the carcass of the famous watch dog, which they had had left on the spot in order to carry home the young one and procure help. They found their two comrades at the place where they had left the lifeless hay; but they had been so much delayed by the labor of cutting up the carcass and preparing it to be transported, and by other difficulties and delays, that it had become too dark for them to find their way back over the hills and rugged rocks. So they had come to the conclusion that they must spend the night in the open air, and had chosen for their place of refuge the sheltered side of a fallen tree. There Mr. Raynal and George, by the light of their lantern, found Harry huddled together, shivering with the cold, and wearily looking for the long night to come.

They were, of course, overjoyed to see their friends coming, and with a lantern too. With the aid of the light they thought that they should have no difficulty in making their way home, even though embarrassed by the heavy burdens which they had to bear. So they took severally their respective shares of the load, one of them bearing the lantern and leading the way.

That night the interior of the cabin presented a festive and joyous spectacle. The abundance of food which they had secured relieved the men from all immediate anxiety. Harry, who had charge of the interior arrangements that week, had built a blazing fire, and had set the table with unusual care. He had nicely brightened up the plates and all the utensils required, and had arranged them upon the table in a very precise and symmetrical manner, as though he were preparing to receive company on a festive occasion. Thus, not only was the warmth of the cabin extremely grateful to the men, coming in from the night-air, but the whole interior wore so bright and cheerful an expression that their hearts were cheered and gladdened by the influence of the scene itself upon their senses, as well as by the joyous thought that they were once more abundantly supplied with food. After relieving themselves of their burdens, and enjoying for a short time the warmth and the cheering influences of the fire, they gathered round the table, in the centre of which Harry had placed a large piece of roast seal, smoking hot: but before they commenced their hearty meal, at Curtius Dhue's suggestion, to render their united thanks to Almighty God for having interposed so effectually to relieve them in their distress, and to bring all their trouble to an issue so full of comfort and joy.

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-SEVENTH.

THE END.

The church clock struck the quarter to eleven.

Hester Dethridge showed herself at the back garden door, shuffling creepingly in, and joined her. The light of the lamp in the passage fell on his face. She started back from the sight of it.

"What's wrong?" he asked.

She shook her head and pointed through the dining-room door to the brandy-bottle on the table.

"I'm as sober as you are, you fool!" he said. "Whatever else it is, it's not that."

Hester looked at him again. He was right. However unsteady his gait might be, his speech was not the speech, his eyes were not the eyes, of a drunken man.

"Is she in her room for the night?"

Hester made the affirmative sign.

Geoffry ascended the stairs, swaying from side to side. He stopped at the top, and beckoned to Hester to join him. He went on when she obeyed, and, signing to her to follow him, closed the door.

He looked at the partition wall—without speaking—and, as Hester waited, behind him.

"Is she asleep?" he asked.

Hester went to the wall, listened at it; and made the affirmative reply.

He sat down. "My head's queer," he said. "Give me a drink of water." He drank part of the water, and poured the rest over his head. His unsteadiness made the task slow to have him. He instantly stopped her. "I can't unwind the strings. Can't lift up the paper. Do it."

She alarmed him by the delay. He rose tolerably opened the door to leave him. "Do you want your clothes changed?" he asked. She closed the door, stolidly submissive in an instant; and crossed to the partition wall.

She lifted the large map of paper on either side of the wall—pointed through the hollowed place—and drew back again to the other end of the room.

He rose and walked unsteadily from the chair to the hollowed place. He looked through a crack of the bed, he waited a little. While he waited, he became conscious of the return of the strange sensations that possessed him. A feeling as of a breath of cold air passed over the right side of his head. It became steadily colder. He could calculate his distances: he could put his hands unerringly on the right spot to open and close the light curtains, hanging from the hook in the ceiling over the head of her bed. He could look at the sleeping face.

She was dimly visible, by the light of the candle placed at the head of the bed. Her hair, worn and wavy look had disappeared from her face. All that had been pursed and sweetest in it had softly become steady and composed. Even the deep sleep that held her gently. She was young again in the dim light. She was beautiful in the calm repose. Her head lay back on the pillow. Her upturned face was in a position which would have compelled the attention of the man under whose eyes she was sleeping—the man who was looking at her, with the merciless resolution in him to take her life.

After waiting a while, he drew back. "She's asleep like a child there is no struggle," he muttered to himself under his breath. He glanced across at the candle. Hester Dethridge. The lighted candle which she had brought up stairs with her was burning near the place where she stood. "I shall have no more use for it," he never moved. He repeated the direction. There she stood, deaf to him.

What was she doing? She was looking fixedly into one of the corners of the room.

He turned his head, and inspected the hollowed place in the wall. He looked at the peaceful face on the pillow once more. He deliberately revived his own vindictive sense of the debt that he owed her. "But for you," he whispered to himself, "I should have won the race: but for you, I should have been friends with my father: but for you, I might marry Mrs. Glenarm." He turned back again into the room while the sense of it was at its fiercest in him. He looked round with round him. He took up a screwdriver—fell for a moment; and threw it down again.

A new idea struck him. In two steps he was at the side of his bed. He seized on one of the pillows, and looked uncertainly at Hester. "It's not a drunken brute, this time," he said to her. "It's a woman who will fight for her life. The pillow's the safest of the two." She never answered him, and never looked toward him. He made sure more for the place in the wall: and stopped midway between it and his bed—stopped, and cast a backward glance over his shoulder.

Hester Dethridge was stirring at last.

With no third person in the room, she was looking, and seeing nothing. She was like the following a third person along the wall, from the corner. Her lips were parted in horror: her eyes opened to their widest, stared rigid and glittering at the empty wall. Step by step, she stole nearer and nearer to Geoffry, still fixing her sense unnatural Thing, which was stealing nearer and nearer, too. He asked himself what it meant. He was aware of the deed that he was about to do more than she was: he could hear? Would she burst out screaming, and wake his wife?

He hurried to the place in the wall—to seize the chance, while the chance was his.

He stended his strong hold on the pillow.

He stooped to pass it through the opening.

He paused at the sound of a sleeping face.

At the same moment he felt Hester Dethridge's hand laid on him from behind. The touch ran through him, from head to foot, like a shock of fire. He drew back with a start, and faced her. Hester, never staring straight over his shoulder at something behind him—looking as her had looked when he left the room. Windgates.

Before he could speak he felt the flash of her eyes in his eyes. For the third time, she had seen the Apparition. And for him, the homicidal frenzy possessed her. She flew at his throat like a mad beast. The feeble old woman attacked the athlete!

He dropped the pillow, and struck a terrible right arm full at her from him, as he might have brushed an insect from him.

Even in the act of striking a frightful distortion seized on his face. As if with an invisible hand, it dragged down the brow and the eyelid on the right side: dragged down the mouth on the same side. His arm fell helpless: his whole body, on the same side, became dead. He dropped on the floor, like a man shot dead.

Hester Dethridge pounced on his prostrate body—knelt on his chest—and fastened her ten fingers on his throat.

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-EIGHTH.

THE SHOCK.

The shock of the fall woke Anne on the instant. She started up—looked round—and saw a gap in the wall at the foot of her bed, and the candle-light shimmering in the next room. Panic-stricken; doubting, for a moment, if she were in her right bed, she came back, waking—listening—looking. She saw nothing but the glimmering light in the room; she heard nothing but a confused noise of some person laboring for breath. The sound ceased. There was an interval of silence. Then the head of Hester Dethridge rose slowly into sight through the gap in the wall—rose with the glittering light of madness in its eyes; and with the hair.

She flew to the open window, and screamed for help.

Sir Patrick's voice answered her, from the road in front of the cottage.

"Wait for me! God's sake!" she cried.

She fled from the room, and rushed down the stairs. The door opened to her, she had opened the door, and was out in the front garden.

As she ran to the gate, she heard the voice of a strange man on the other side of it. Sir Patrick called to her encouragingly. "The policeman is with me," he said. "I met him at the gate—at night—he has a key." As he spoke the gate was opened from the outside. She saw Sir Patrick, followed by the policeman. She strangered toward them as they came in—she was just able to say, "Make haste!" before terror stilled her. Sir Patrick saved her from falling. He placed her on the bench in the garden, and hurried into the cottage, while Arnold and the policeman hurried into the cottage.

"Where first?" asked Arnold.

"The room the lady called from," said the policeman.

They mounted the stairs, and entered Anne's room. The gap in the wall was instantly observed by both of them. They looked through it.

Inverary Dalmsyan's dead body lay on the floor. Hester Dethridge was kneeling at his head, praying.

Epilogue.

A MORNING CALL.

The newspapers have announced the return of Lord and Lady Holchester to their residence in London, after an absence on the continent of more than six months.

It is the height of the season. All day long, within the mansion in Grosvenor square, the door of Holchester House is perpetually opening to receive visitors. The vast majority leave their cards, and go away again. Certain privileged individuals only, get out of their carriages, and enter the house.

Among these latter, arriving at an earlier hour than is customary, is a person of distinction who is positively bent on seeing either the master or the mistress of the house, and who will take no denial. While this person is parleying with the chief of the servants, Lord Holchester, passing from one room to another, happens to cross the inner end of the hall. The person instantly darts at him with a cry of "Dear Lord Holchester!" Julius turns, and sees—Lady Lundie!

He is fairly caught, and he gives way with his best grace. As he opens the door of the nearest room for her ladyship, he furtively consults his watch, and says in his inmost soul, "How am I to get rid of her before the others come?"

Lady Lundie settles down on a sofa in a whirlwind of silk and lace, and becomes, in her own majestic way, "perfectly charming." She makes the most affectionate inquiries about Lady Holchester, about the Honorable Lady Holchester, about Julius himself. Where have they been? Are they very tired? Are they sure and thoroughly cured them to recover the shock of that dreadful event, to which Lady Lundie dare not more particularly allude? Julius answers everything, and a little absently. He makes polite inquiries, on his side, as to her ladyship's plans and projects. She spends a most unusually extensive of the inexorable hour of time, and of certain probabilities which that hour may bring with it. Lady Lundie has very little to say about herself. She has already touched on: acknowledged that she could not find herself in London without feeling an act of duty involved in making inquiries at the house in which Hester Dethridge is employed for life; announces that she has not only made the inquiries, but that she has seen the woman herself, has spoken to her, has found her unconscious of her dreadful position, incapable of the smallest exercise of memory, resigned to the existence that she leads, and likely (in the opinion of the medical gentleman attended) to live for some years to come. Having stated these facts, her ladyship is about to make a few of those "remarks appropriate to the occasion," in which she excels, when the door opens; and Lady Holchester, in search of her missing husband, enters the room.

II.

There is a new outburst of affectionate interest on Lady Lundie's part—met civilly, but not cordially, by Lady Holchester. Julius's wife seems, like Julius, to be uneasily conscious of the lapse of time. Like Julius again, she privately wonders how long Lady Lundie is going to stay.

Julius makes various signs of impatience, unseen by Lady Holchester, which Lady Lundie is too much absorbed to notice. He says something—and she says it not. Is she going to say it? Yes. She is going to get, by a roundabout way, to the object in view. Julius makes another inquiry of Holchester sort to make. May she be permitted to resume the subject of her visit? Will Lady Holchester excuse her? They have been at Rome. Can they confirm the shocking intelligence which has reached us of the "sway" of Mrs. Glenarm?

Lady Holchester can confirm it, by personal experience. Mrs. Glenarm has assumed the position, and has taken refuge in the bosom of the Holy Catholic Church. Lady Holchester has been her a witness at Rome. She is passing through the period of her probation; and she is resolved to take the vei. Lady Lundie, as a good Protestant, lifts her hands in horror—declares the topic to be too painful to dwell on—and, by your leave, goes straight to the point at last. Has Lady Holchester, in the course of her continental experience, happened to meet with a friend of hers—Mrs. Arnold Brinkworth?

"I have ceased, as you know, to hold any communication with my relations," Lady Lundie explains. "The course they took at the time of our family trial—the sympathy they felt with that wicked woman—I am not even sure that I ought to name more particularly—alienated us from each other. I have heard, however, that Holchester; but I hear no malice. And I shall always feel a motherly interest in hearing of Arnold's welfare. I have heard that he left and her husband were traveling, at the time when you left Rome. Lord Holchester were traveling. Did you meet with them?"

Julius and his wife looked at each other. Lord Holchester looks at Lady Lundie.

"We saw Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Brinkworth at Florence, and afterward at Naples, Lady Lundie. They returned to England a week since, in anticipation of a certain happy event, which will possibly increase the members of your family circle. They are now in London. Indeed, they will you that we expect them here to lunch to-day."

Having made this plain statement, Lady Holchester looks at Lady Lundie. (If that doesn't hasten her departure, nothing will!)

Quite useless! Lady Lundie holds her ground. Having heard absolutely nothing of her relatives for the last six months, she is burning with curiosity to hear more. There is a name she has not mentioned yet. She places a certain construction upon herself, and mentions it now.

"And Sir Patrick?" says her ladyship, subduing her voice to gentle melancholy, suggestive of past injuries condoned by Christian forgiveness.

Lady Lundie's tone and respect tells her. Did you meet with Sir Patrick at Florence and Naples, also?

Julius and his wife look at each other again. The clock in the hall strikes. Julius shudders. Lady Holchester's patience begins to give way. There is an awkward pause. Somebody must say something. As before, Lady Holchester replies:

"Sir Patrick went abroad, Lady Lundie, with his niece and her husband; and Sir Patrick has come back with them."

"In good health?" her ladyship inquires.

"Younger than ever," Lady Holchester rejoins.

Lady Lundie smiles satirically. Lady Holchester notices the smile; decides that mercy shown to this woman is merely misplaced; and announces (to her husband's horror) that she has news to tell of Sir Patrick, which will probably take his sister-in-law by surprise.

Lady Lundie waits eagerly to hear what the news is.

"It is no secret," Lady Holchester proceeds —"though it is only known, as yet, to a few intimate friends. Sir Patrick has made an important change in his life."

Lady Lundie's charming smile suddenly goes out.

"Sir Patrick is not only a very clever and very agreeable man," Lady Holchester resumes, a little nervously, "he is also, in all his habits and ways (as you well know), a man younger than his years—who still possesses many of the qualities which seldom fail to attract women."

Lady Lundie starts to her feet.

"You don't mean to tell me, Lady Holchester, that Sir Patrick is married?"

"I do."

Her ladyship drops back on the sofa; helpless, really and truly helpless, under the double blow that has fallen on her. She is not only struck out of her place as the chief woman of the family, but (still on the right side of forty) she is solemnly recommended, as the Dowager Lady Lundie, for the rest of her life!

"At his age!" she exclaims, as soon as she can speak.

"Pardon me for reminding you," Lady Holchester answers, "that plenty of men younger than Sir Patrick's age. In his case, it is only due to him to say that his motive raises him high above the reach of ridicule or reproach. His marriage is a good action, in the highest sense of the word. It does honor to him, as well as to the lady who shares his position and his name."

"A young girl, of course!" is Lady Lundie's next remark.

"No. A woman who has been tried by no common sorrow, and who has borne it nobly—but not nobly. A woman who deserves the colmer and the happier life on which she is entering now."

"May I ask who she is?"

Before the question can be answered, a knock at the house door announces the arrival of visitors. For the third time, Julius and his wife look at each other. On this occasion, Julius speaks first.

"My wife has already told you, Lady Lundie, that we expect Mr. and Mrs. Brinkworth to lunch. Sir Patrick, and the new Lady Lundie, accompany them. If I am mistaken in supposing that it might not be quite agreeable to you to meet them, I can only ask your pardon. If I am right, I will leave Lady Holchester to receive our friends, and will do myself the honor of taking you to another room."

He advances to the door of an inner room. He offers his arm to Lady Lundie. Her ladyship stands immovable; determined to see the woman who has supplanted her. In a moment more, the door of entrance flies open, and is thrown open; and the servant announces, "Sir Patrick and Lady Lundie. Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Brinkworth."

Lady Lundie looks at the woman who has taken her place at the head of the family; and sees —ANNE SILVESTER!

THE END.

THE SEAT OF WAR IN EUROPE.

BY referring to our carefully engraved map on page 500, which shows the greater part of France and Prussia, our readers will be able to follow without difficulty the accounts of the movements of the hostile armies.

On the left bank of the Rhine the principal strategic points are Metz, Thionville, and Forbach. The first-named city, lying in the confluence of the Moselle and the Seille, is one of the most strongly fortified places in France. It contains a population of about 50,000, and in 1728 the town was nothing but a collection of narrow streets, dirty and badly built; but since that time it has been so thoroughly reconstructed that but few souvenirs of its ancient picturesque squalidity remain, and it is now provided with all the modern improvements of wide, well-shaded streets and courts, good drainage, well-built and deciphered promenades. The houses are constructed solidly of stone, are generally of a very simple architecture, and have rarely four floors. A great number have garrets attached. Some streets on the right bank of the Moselle are very steep, and are impassable for carriages. Confined now in narrower limits than it was formerly, the city of Metz no holds a part of its monuments, its abbeys, and its churches replaced by immense fortifications, of such extent that a besieging army of at least 120,000 men would be required to invest it thoroughly. The city has not been taken since it was surrounded by a wall. The approaches to the town are defended by two forts, six lunettes, and one earth-work. The two forts were built by the celebrated CORMONTAIGNE. That of Belle Croix, with the lunette of Gisaucourt, presents a development of galleries of mines of about 10,000 metres, and crowns on the east the heights from which one can leap into the city. The other fort, called Fort Moselle, or the "Double Crown," is situated toward the north. Its works, composed of ditches full of water and flanking fortifications, make it very difficult of approach.

Thionville, on the left bank of the Moselle, and nearer the Rhine, is scarcely less important than Metz, in a military point of view. Its fortifications are of great extent and strength, though the town itself consists of only a few streets and courts. Perhaps no other city in the world has changed masters more often than Thionville. It belonged to the Saxons in 1443, to the Duke of Bourgogne in 1514, two years later to LADISLAS V., King of Hungary and Bohemia, to the Dukes of Bourgogne from 1467 to 1477, to the imperial house of Hapsburg up to 1599, to the Kings of Spain up to 1643, and finally passed into the possession of France, of which it originally formed a part. In 1814 the town was besieged by the Prussians, who were forced to retire with heavy loss.

Forbach, in whose vicinity an unimportant engagement is reported to have taken place, is a delightfully situated town on the northern bank of Moselle, lying in a pleasant plain at the foot of a mountain called Schlossberg. Its streets are narrow and winding, and it derives its chief importance from its industries, and its position as one of the principal inlets from Germany into France.

Further up, on the left bank of the Rhine, lies the important city of Strasbourg, capital of the German town, where the French army under Marshal BAZAINE is concentrated. At this point a bridge of boats crossed the Rhine to Kehl, a small village of Baden, a few miles south of the important German fortress of Rastadt. Immediately on the declaration of war by France this bridge was destroyed from the German side.

Owing to the severe winds and heavy movements of troops in France it is difficult to ascertain the position of the forces engaged for the invasion of Prussia. The army of the Moselle, it is reported, will be under the command of Marshal BAZAINE, whose headquarters are fixed at Metz. The army of the Rhine, under MARSHAL MACMAHON, is concentrated at Strasbourg, where an attempt may be made to cross the Rhine for an invasion of South German territory. At the time of writing no movement has been made on either side; but the period of preparation can not last much longer, and by the end of the time these words come under the reader's eye the hostile armies will have met in the first great shock of the war.

On the right bank of the Rhine there are several very strong positions in the northern part of Prussia. First, there is the fortress of Rastadt, in Baden, considered one of the strongest fortifications in Europe. Should the French succeed in forcing the passage of the Rhine at Strasbourg, Rastadt will be the first place to be taken.

Further down the river lies the ancient city of Mainz, or Mayence, very strongly fortified. It is a very old and picturesque city, and, according to legendary records, was founded either by certain grandsons of NOAH, shortly after the Deluge, or by the fugitives from Troy, after the destruction of that city by the Greeks. As neither legend has any claim to credence, the reader may accept either or both.

The most important fortress, as well as the strongest, on the right bank of the Rhine, is that of Ehrenbreitstein, commonly called the Gibraltar of Germany. It is situated on a rock on the immense rock opposite the city of Coblentz. Vast sums of money, and the best efforts of military engineering skill, have been for years past expended in making this strong-hold as nearly impregnable as fortification can be made. Here are kept immense quantities of military stores and munitions of war, and a vast army could find shelter under its protection. The position on the river, and the nature of the surrounding country, almost insure it immunity from siege operations.

The fortifications at Cologne, as well as the Germans write the name of that city, consist mainly of earth-works, which can be rendered very formidable, on short notice, should a hostile movement be made in that direction.

GOING TO MARKET.

M. L. PERRAULT, the painter of this picture, was a pupil of M. HOUSSEMAN; and although still young, his work closely rivals that of his master. M. HOUSSEMAN has not, however, attempted subjects so ambitious as some of those by which M. BOUGUEREAU is known. His pictures are generally drawn from humble, and frequently child life, as in the picture engraved, and a larger composition in the same exhibition, entitled "The Orphans." The manner in which these simple subjects are treated may, however, be instanced as typical of the style of the entire art. Take, for example, the present picture. A little peasantess is resting on her way to the market, held at a neighboring town. Her assembly all the produce which can be spared from the immediate necessities of the support of the French farmsteads, owing to the law which ordains equal division of the land among the members of each family. A heavier burden than this could scarcely be selected or devised. The child is not weak or ill-formed, and is an evident aim at largeness of style not unworthy of an important historical theme, and it is, at all events, endowed with a careful anatomical completeness which we are accustomed to see in the best examples of modern French painting. There is, of course, a good and a bad side to this peculiar mode of dealing with incidents of common life. Carefully executed it is always acceptable, and here the workmanship is certainly of the highest order. Moreover, it may have the wholesome moral effect of enlarging our sympathies to see the loveliest pictorial material occupied in doing a vehicle for noble, refined, and finished art. On the other hand, one is apt to feel some incongruity between the subject-matter of the class of painters to whom we allude, and the polish (sometimes manifestly superficial and excessive) in which they too generally indulge. A sense of artificiality and of insincerity in the artist is very liable to arise; and the evil reaches its climax when, as is frequently the case, one is reminded more of Academical conventionalism than of true unsophisticated nature. To be just, however, decidedly the better side of the treatment is exemplified in the charming picture given on our first page.

CHINESE ART.

THE works of art of the Chinese are well known for their great beauty of color and form in porcelain, and the extraordinary fineness as well as originality of design in carvings of wood and ivory; while the bronze objects which represent the antique art of China are often most remarkable for the skill and fancy with which the forms of natural objects, plants, and animals have been treated in composing the ornament. The grotesques, for which they have an especial liking, are also far beyond any that European artists have designed; many of these are carved in the jade, which is almost as hard as diamond, and can only be worked by great labor. The roots of trees are also very cleverly carved into grotesque figures and animals, displaying the most curious and imaginative fancy. In painting they are great imitators; and, having good models, they succeed in painting birds, flowers, fruit, animals, and figures of men and women in the brightest and finest colors, but without any idea of very correct drawing or placing the object in perspective. In this respect they are behind the Japanese, who show a much more artistic feeling for natural beauty and picturesque arrangement. The lacquer work is another branch of their ornamental art, which is now familiar to our shops. One of the most wonderful of all their feats in delicate work is the magic mirror. The Italian artists of the sixteenth century engraved ornamental devices in their metallic mirrors, and on the back of the plate they often bestowed the greatest labor; but nothing approaches the Chinese work. Their mirrors appear bright, and like any ordinary looking-glass; but in certain lights the design shines out brilliantly upon the polished surface, thus not interfering with the use of the mirror for seeing in it. But then this curious thing is, that, on looking at the back of the plate, there we see the design again, so delicately that it is completely deceived by the appearance of transparency thus most cleverly given. The Chinese, however, have not yet approached to any real perception of the beauty and power of art as the European nations have felt so many centuries back; in this they are among the youngest of nations, although no doubt, they can claim an acquaintance with art that reaches as far back as the ancient Egyptians. They have long had their portrait-painters, and they make some attempt at painting subjects, such as assemblies of mandarins and people of importance—all very closely imitative in the work, rather stiff, as we see in all early works of this nature. The intercourse with Europeans will, however, be sure to encourage the native artists, for ornamental objects and pictures, and we shall see this last development of a people's civilization arising as the railroad, the locomotive, and the electric telegraph make their appearance in the Celestial Empire. The latest leader in the movement of outer barbarism into the preserves of Celestial civilization happens to be Sir Frederick Bruce, Commissioner Lay, who is already contemplating a visit to this country, to prepare the way and make the acquaintance of our great engineers.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"IN afraid, dear wife, that while I am gone absence will cause forgetfulness." "Oh, never fear, dear husband; the longer you stay away the better I shall like you."

THE MARE NAPOLEON AIDS AT—Bismarck.

During the long French war two old ladies in Strasbourg were talking by the kirk; the one said to the other, "Was it not a wonderful thing that the Prussians were sae victorious owre the French?" "Ou, ay," was the answer; "but, ye ken, Providence aye favors the party in the right!"

"Not a bit," said the other; "for I'm sure the Prussians are the warst!" "Ou, but their prayers before gae to heaven better!" The other replied, "But canna the French say they're prayers as weel?" The reply was quite characteristic: "Hoot, jabbering bodies, they could understand them!"

Last week a gentleman of this city was going over what he'give a young friend, and finally decided it should be a ring. "Now, my boy, what kind of a ring would you like?" "Oh, I'm very particular; there are so many sorts." "Well, Mr. Johnson—one, you know, don't like to raise a shade in these matters—little delicate—you understand—but really, if you insist upon it, I will tell you why. I should like an engagement ring dearly; are the lines not regular?"

A beggar went into the store of a popular wholesale and retail confectionery dealer and asked for a penny. Mr. Morgan was busy at him a moment with some important commercial eminence, and then replied, "I don't like to be strong, don't you? I never give away money, but you can send if you asked for a few cents worth of candy." "Well, then, give me a few cents, was the quick reply. This was too much for our dealer, and he gave up—he cents.

A Western editor contributes the following to the paragraphed that 'notice had not been taken him' is the remark that it was 'very lucky for him.'

"Please, Sir, I don't think Mr. Doolin takes his physic regular, and a doctor's boy has to wheedle it into him." "Cause cry, he's getting well no precious fast."

The answer lately given in a French court by a prisoner accused of violent assault is likely to give law, with a smile, "Well, Monsieur le President, you know every one has his little failing."

"I say, Jim, they tell me there is a man down East that's so industrious that he works twenty-five hours a day." "Come in fast, Cully; there are only twenty-four hours in a day." "Why, he gets up an hour before daylight, and stops after dark."

"May I ask the time of day, Sir?" said a stranger to Mr. Buffum. "By all means, Sir—by all means," replied the amiable Mr. Buffum. "Well, Sir, what time is it?" "Upon my word I don't know. I have not watched the time lately."

A fellow, having a spite at a sausage-maker, rushed into his shop, which crowded with customers, threw a large dead cat upon the counter, and said: "That makes fifteen!" "Well sir!" the man says no ne bose?" and made his exit. He was, of course, followed by the sausage-maker, amid great laughter.

Lillie — and her brother called at a house on their way to school, one cold morning, to get some biscuit. Some doubts were expressed as to her brother being old enough to attend school. "Oh yes" said Lillie; "he is six; and mother says if he hadn't been sick he would have been as much as seven or eight."

A San Francisco school-teacher received the following note from the "estensible" parent of one of his pupils: "I hope se to my John, you will flog him just as ofte as you kin. Hes a bad boy—Je John. Altho I've bin ladin of teachin him myself, it seems to me he never will never,ben nothing—his spellin is strange, his writin is scrawl, Wallop him well, we pay a will uncle my Bargin."

P.S. What accounts for John bein sich a scholar is that he is my uncle's son by wife's first husband."

The following singular advertisement appears in a Canada paper:

"All dete people what I owes,
I'll not ax dem for dat;
But will dem people what owes me,
Must pay me immediat."

A cream-taker recently asked a servant-girl in the vicinity of Boston how many regular customers she had there were in the house. She informed him that there were fifteen besides in all, but "most monk's fear of 'em is steady; the rest is dimocrats!"

A wife asked her husband if druggists kept dyestuffs for sale. He replied: "Most druggists keep little else but die stuffs."

There is a farmer in Yorkshire who has a mile of children. He has a dozen boys, and a mile of four boys and four girls. Eight farthings makes one mile.

"Why, Bill, what's the matter with you? You look down in the mouth." "Well, Tom, I don't dare say, if you'll keen through what I have, you'd look bad too." "What's the matter, Bill?" "Well, you know Bob's brother, don't you, Peter?" "Yes." "I discarded her last night." "You did?" "Yes." "Well, I'll tell you what she wouldn't marry me, and I'd discard any girl that would treat me in that manner."

Judge K——, of North Carolina, is a great stickler for forms. One day a soldier, who had been battered considerably in the war, was brought in as a witness. The judge bids him to hold up his right hand. "Can't do it, Sir," said the man. "Why not?" "Got a shot in that arm, Sir." "Then hold up your left." The man said that he had got a shot in that arm too. "Then," said the judge, solemnly, "you must hold up your leg. No man ever can be sworn, Sir, in this court by law, unless he holds up something."

"I understand you make very good cider?" "Yaw," said the Dutchman; "Haze, my poy, go bring a mugful." Here entered a pedlar with a mug brimming full, and handed it to the Dutchman, who drained it to the bottom at one draught. Then turning to his astonished visitor, said: "Dere now, if you dont not dink dat tis vare cider, you'd petter not puy any."

A pretty good story is told of an expressman from Boston, who on delivering trunks was very punctilious. He one day received an order from a physician for a five-pound Britannia syringe. The next morning the worthy doctor was considerably astonished by receiving five pounds of Britannia sausages!

THE NEW COMET—A PHENOMENON NOW VISIBLE IN ALL PARTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

THE LAST OF HIS TRIBE.

He crouches and buries his face on his knees,
 And hides in the dark of his hair;
For he can not look up to the storm-smitten trees,
 Or think of the loneliness there—
 Of the loss and the loneliness there.

The wallaroos grope through the tufts of the grass,
 And turn to their covers for fear;
But he sits in the ashes and lets them pass
 Where the boomerangs sleep with the spear—
 With the nullah, the sling, and spear.

Uloola, behold him! The thunder that breaks
 On the tops of the rocks with the rain,
And the wind which drives up with the salt of the lakes,
 Have made him a hunter again—
 A hunter and fisher again.

For his eyes have been full with a smouldering thought;
 But he dreams of the hunts of yore,
And of foes that he sought, and of fights that he fought
 With those who will battle no more—
 Who will go to the battle no more.

It is well that the water which tumbles and fills Goes moaning and moaning along,
For an echo rolls out from the sides of the hills,
 And he starts at a wonderful song—
 At the sounds of a wonderful song.

And he sees, through the rents of the scattering fogs,
 The corrobboree warlike and grim,
And the lubra who sat by the fire on the logs,
 To watch, like a mourner, for him—
 Like a mother and mourner for him.

Will he go in his sleep from these desolate lands,
 Like a chief, to the rest of his race,
With the honey-voiced woman who beckons, and stands,
 And gleams like a dream in his face—
 Like a marvelous dream in his face?

CHAPTER III.

THE NIGHT-WATCH.

It was an easy thing enough, as Walter Grange had said, to make acquaintance with Carew of Crompton, and possible even to become his bosom friend at a short notice, for his friendships, all made in wine, at play, or in the hunting-field, were soon cemented; but then, if the introduction was effected in an unpropitious time or manner, it was like enough to end in affront or downright insult. A gulf might be fixed just where you wanted a causeway, and of this—though he had feigned to inquire about it so innocently of the honest park-keeper—Richard Yorke was well aware. He had, as has been hinted, come down to Crompton with the express view of throwing himself in the way of its eccentric master, and to do so opportunely, and he was content to bide his time. Thus, though the autumn had far advanced, and the time had come for men of his craft to hasten from the dropping, dripping woods, no longer fair, to hive at home their sweet memorials of the summer time, Richard remained at Crompton, not willingly, indeed, nor even patiently, but with that sort of dogged resolve which is engendered, even in a restless spirit, by long watching. He had stopped so long that he would not now give up his watch; the fortress, indeed, showed no more sign of breach than when he first sat down before it; but still he would not raise the siege. This persistency excited no surprise in his house companion; Walter Grange was no gossip, nor curious about other men's affairs; it was easy, even for him, to see that his tenant had a proud stomach, and he had set down his talk about desiring an introduction to Carew as merely another phrase for wishing for a good chance of disposing of his wares to best advantage in that market to which so many of such various callings thronged. He did not think, as he had honestly confessed, that there was much chance of the Squire becoming a patron of the fine arts, but he wished the young fellow luck, and was glad, for more than one reason, that he staid on.

It was at least three months after his young lodger's arrival that Walter burst into his sitting-room one afternoon, without his usual knock at the door, with the great news that he had just had word, by a safe hand, that a gang of poachers would be in the Home Park that very night, and that all the staff of keepers would be out in waiting for them.

"You know," said he, quite indignant that the young man did not show his enthusiasm, "you told me I was to be sure and let you know, Mr. Yorke; but, of course, you needn't make one of us unless you like."

"Oh yes, I'll come," laughed the young fellow—"that is, provided it is fine. I can't fight in the rain, even for the game laws."

"It'll be a lovely night, Sir, with just enough of moonlight to know friends from foes," went on the keeper, rubbing his hands, and unconsciously moistening them in his excitement. "I knew you'd come. I said to myself: 'Mr. Yorke 'll never turn tail;' and we shall be really glad of your help, for the fact is we are short-handed. Napes is down with the rheumatics, and two of our men are away from home, and there ain't time to send to the out-beaters. So we shall be only nine—including yourself—in all. Let's see," continued the old man, counting on his fingers: "there'll be Bill Nokes, and Robert Sloane, and—"

"Spare me the roll-call, Grange," interrupted the painter; "and tell me where I am to be, and when, and I'll be there."

"Very good, Sir," said the keeper, musing. "I'll put you at the Squire's oak—the one as you drawed so nicely—that'll be at the Decoy down yonder, and close to home. You have only to use this whistle, and you'll get help enough if you chance to be set upon; there will be a fight, no doubt. They must be a daring lot to poach the near park, within sound of the house: they ain't a done that these ten year; for the last time they brought Squire and his bull-dogs out, which was a lesson to one or two of 'em. However, he's for town, they say, to-day."

"All right, Grange; we must do without him, then," returned the young man, cheerfully. "What time am I to be on guard?"

"You should be there at ten at latest, Sir. There'll be plenty of us within whistle-call, you understand. But nobody will come aneist you as has any business there; so whoever you see you must go in at."

Yorke nodded, smiling, and doubling his white fists, hit out scientifically with his right.

"You're one after the Squire's own heart," exclaimed the keeper, admiringly; "and I do wish you could foregather with him. What a reach of arm you've got, and what a play of muscle! The fist is the weapon for a poacher—that is, I mean agin him—if you only know how to use it. I can depend on the Decoy being guarded by ten, Sir, can I? for I must be off to the head-keeper's with the rest."

"Yes, you can."

"Then, good-by, Sir, for the present."

"Now what a poor fool is that!" soliloquized the young painter, contemptuously, as the door closed upon his late companion. "To think that I should risk my life against a poacher's on even terms! Of course, if they suffice, I shall only treat him to my knuckles; but if not—if he be a giant, or there be more than one of them—then here is a better ally than mere bone and sinew." Yorke took out of a drawer a life-preserver, made of lead and whalebone, struck with it once, to test its weight and elasticity, then slipped it into his shooting-jacket pocket. "That will enlarge their organs of locality," said he, grimly; "they will not forget the Decoy Pond in a hurry whose heads knock against this."

He made a better supper than was usual with him that night; filled his pocket-flask with brandy, and his pouch with tobacco; and then making sure that the whistle Grange had given him, and which he had hung round his neck, was within easy reach of his fingers, sallied out, well wrapped up as to his throat, and with his hands in his pockets. If Richard Yorke was doomed not to have life made easy for him, he made it as easy as he could. He never omitted a precaution, unless it gave him trouble to take it out of proportion to the advantage it conferred; he was never imprudent, unless the passion of the moment was too strong for him; but sometimes, unfortunately, his mere whims were in their intensity passions, and his passions, while they lasted, fits of madness. He was a landscape-painter, partly because he had some taste that way, but chiefly because he hated regular work of any sort. He had no real love for his art, and not the least touch of poetic feeling. He knew an oak from a beech-tree, and the sort of touch that should be used in delineating the foliage of each; a yellow primrose was to him a yellow primrose, and he could mix the colors deftly enough which made up its hue. His education had been by no means neglected, but it had been of a strange sort; every thing he had learned was, as it were, for immediate use, and of a superficial but attractive character. The advocates of a classical curriculum would have shaken their heads at what Richard Yorke did know, almost as severely as at his lack of knowledge. He had read a good deal of all kinds of literature, including much garbage; he could play a little on the piano, and speak French with an excellent accent. In a word, he had learned every thing that had pleased him, as well as a little Latin and some mathematics, which had not. He knew English history far better than most young Englishmen; but the sight of tomb or ruin had never made his heart pulse faster with an evoked idea by a single beat. Historical associations had no charm for him. This mighty oak, for example, under the shadow of which he now stands sentry, and which he had transferred so deftly to his port-folio, has no longer any interest for him. He has "done it," and its use and pleasure are therefore departed in his eyes. He knows quite well that though it is called the Squire's, in token, probably, of some wholesale slaughter of wild-ducks effected by Carew from its convenient cover, that this tree is hundreds of years old—the oldest in all the chase. He has read the "Talking Oak," for indeed he can quote Tennyson by the yard, and in dulcet voice; and it would have been natural enough, one would think, in such a time and place, that some thoughts of what this venerable monarch of the forest must have witnessed would perforce come into his mind. The same moonlight that now shines down between its knotted naked branches must have doubtless lit on many a pair of lovers, for it was ever a favorite place for tryst in by-gone years. The young monk, perhaps, may here (when Crompton was an abbey) have given double absolution, to himself and to the girl who confessed to him her love. Roundhead maiden and Cavalier gallant must many a time have forgotten their political differences beneath this oak, as yet a tree not sacred to royalty; nay, perhaps even those of York and Lancaster may here have been compounded for, in one red rose of a blush. Bluff Harry had haply hunted beneath its once wide-spreading arms, and certainly the martyr king had done so, with a score of generations of men of all sorts, dead and gone, God alone knows whither. Though no more the bugle sounded, nor the twanging bow was heard, there was surely an echo of their far-away music in the young painter's ear! No, there was none.

> Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard was a line Richard Yorke had read, perhaps, but certainly had not understood. He heard the bare branch creak and sway above his head as the wind slowly took it; he heard the night-jar croak, as it flew by on silent wing; and now and then he heard, or thought he heard, the sound of the voices of his fellow-watchers a great way off, which was his only touch of fancy. They were all silent, and in close hiding.

It is not to be supposed, however, that his mind was fixed upon the matter in which he was engaged, so that other subjects were thereby excluded from it. The repression of night-poaching was not a matter that interested him either in principle or practice. He would just as soon that the keeper had not reminded him of his offer to share his watch—the whim that had once seized him to do so had died away; but having once promised his company, he was not one to break his word. So here he was.

The young man's thoughts were busy, then, neither with the past nor the present, but with the future—that is, his own future. The path of life did not lie straight before Richard Yorke, as it does before most men of his age, and in fact it came, so to speak, abruptly to a termination exactly where he stood.

In such a case, the choice of the wayfarer becomes boundless, and is only limited by the horizon and circumstances. As matters were, he had scarcely enough to live on—not nearly enough to do so as his tastes and habits suggested; and yet, by one bold stroke, with luck to back it, he might, not "one day" (that would have had small charm for him), but at once, and for his life-long, be rich and prosperous. He could not be said to have expectations, but his position was not without certain contingencies, the extreme brilliancy of which might almost atone for their vagueness. It was from a dream of future greatness, or what seemed to him as such, wherein he saw himself wealthy and powerful, surrounded with luxury and with the ministers of every pleasure, that he was suddenly and sharply awakened by a trifling incident—the snapping of a dead twig in the copse hard by. In an instant the glittering gossamer of thought was swept aside, and the young fellow was all ear and eye. The wind had dropped for some time, and the silence was intense; that solemn hush seemed to pervade the forest which some poet has attributed to the cessation of spiritual life, as though the haunters of the glade were waiting for the resumption of their occupations until the interloping mortal should pass by. Nothing stirred, or, if so, it was motion without sound, as when the full-feathered owl slid softly through the midnight air above him. Not a dead leaf fell; and where the leaves had fallen there they lay. How was it, then, that a twig broke? The deer were couched; the pheasants sat at roost, their heads beneath that splendid coverlet, their wing; and though there were creeping things which even midnight did not woo to rest in that vast wilderness, Yorke had imbibed enough of forest lore to know that the noise which he had heard was produced by none of these. A rat in the water-rushes, or a stoat pushing through the undergrowth, would have announced itself in a different fashion. Again the sound was heard, and this time it was no longer the crackling of a twig, but the breaking of a branch; then cautious footsteps fell upon the frosty leaves, and, with a light leap on the bank that fringed the copse, the poacher stood in the open.

That such he was, Yorke had no doubt whatever; the moonlight streamed full upon him, and showed him to be none of the Crompton keepers, unless, indeed, he was disguised. For an instant, it passed across his mind that this might be Walter Grange himself—he was about the same height and build—come to play a trick upon him to test his courage, for the man's face was blackened like a burglar's; but this idea was dismissed as soon as entertained. The keeper, he reflected, thought far too seriously of the night's doings to make jest of them, and besides, he could never have sprung upon the bank as yonder fellow did, his limbs, though sturdy, being stiff with age and occasional rheumatism. The intruder seemed quite alone, and it was probable, while his confederates paid attention to the pheasants in the Home Park, that he was bent upon making a private raid upon the sleeping water-fowl. He had no gun, however, nor, as far as Yorke could make out, any other weapon; and as soon as he had got near enough to the pond to admit of it the watcher sprang out from beneath the shadow of the oak, and placed himself between the stranger and the copse from which he had emerged. Yorke was the taller by full six inches, and believing himself to be more than a match for his antagonist, had not so much as laid finger on his concealed weapon; but if he had now any thought of doing so, it was too late; for, with a cry of eager rage, the man turned at once, and sprang at him like a tiger. It needed all his skill and coolness to parry the fierce blows which fell upon him like hail, and which he had scarcely time to return. Yorke was an adept at boxing, and in the chance encounters into which a somewhat dissipated and reckless youth had led him, he had been an easy victor; but it now took all he knew to "keep himself." An instant's carelessness, or the absence of a hand in search of that which he would now have gladly seized, and his guard would have been broken through, and himself placed at his foe's mercy. Nothing but his long reach preserved him from those sledge-hammer blows, which seemed as though each must break the arm they fell upon. As for using his whistle, the opportunity, of course, was not afforded him; and, moreover, he had no breath to spare for such a purpose. Breath, however, was also a desideratum with the poacher, and the more so inasmuch as he accompanied every blow—as Brian de Bois-Guilbert was wont to hammer home his mace-strokes with "Ha! Beauseant, Beauseant!"—with some amazing oath. It is recorded of an American gentleman, much given to blasphemy, that he could entertain "an intelligent companion" for half a day with the mere force and ingenuity of his expletives; and this singular talent seemed to be shared by Richard Yorke's antagonist. That one of the most accomplished roughs of the Midlands had fallen to the young painter's lot in that night's mêlée, he could not for a moment doubt; but this reflection did not go far to soothe him. He did not care for fighting for its own sake, while his pride revolted against thus being kept at bay by a brutal clown. If he could but get the chance, he made up his mind to end this matter once for all, and at last the opportunity seemed to be afforded. The poacher suddenly stepped back to the very margin of the pond, a long oval piece of water, and not very deep, and quick as thought, Yorke drew his deadly weapon. But at the same moment there was a sound of racing feet, and down the drive there came two men at headlong speed. Yorke did not doubt that they were poachers; but his blood was up, and he was armed—he felt like an iron-clad against whom three wooden ships were about to pit themselves. "Where I hit now I make a hole," he muttered, savagely, and stood firm; nor did he even put his lips to the whistle that hung round his neck.

But as the men came nearer, in the foremost he recognized Walter Grange, and at the same moment saw his late antagonist plunge wildly into the ice-cold pond, and begin to wade and swim across it.

"Cuss him! I durst not do it," gasped Walter, just too late, and mindful, even in his passionate disappointment, of rheumatic pains. "Dash after him, Bob, while Mr. Yorke and I run round."

But Bob had had the rheumatism too, or had seen the unpleasant effects of it in others, and shook his shaggy head.

A mocking laugh burst from the poacher, already nearing the opposite bank.

"Dang him! If I'd got a gun, I'd shoot him. Run, man!" cried Walter, excitedly—"run, man, run! He can never get along in his wet clothes." And off the two men started in hot pursuit.

Yorke watched them toiling round the pond, while the poacher landed, shook himself like any water-dog, and leisurely trotted off.

"It was lucky for him," murmured he, as he replaced his weapon in his pocket, "that the help came on my side;" then lit his pipe, and leisurely walked home.

Three hours later returned the keeper (for whose arrival he had been sitting up), with twinkling eye and a look of triumph.

"Well, you caught the beggar, did you, Grange?"

"Oh yes, we caught him fast enough," responded the other, grinning; "we caught the whole lot of them. And who d'ye think they were? Why, it was the whole party from the house, as had come out to play at poachers! Who ever heard of such a game? Some on 'em got it hot, I reckon, in the new spinney yonder. But that was no matter. We've all had our skins full of rum punch, and a sov. apiece, because Squire says we proved ourselves good watch-dogs. And here," continued the old man, exultingly, "are a couple of sovs. for yourself. 'Give them to that tall young fellow,' says Squire, 'as you posted by the Decoy Pond, for he knows how to use his fists.' Why, that 'ere chap as you had the tussle with was Carew hisself!"

A deadly paleness overspread the young man's cheeks.

"Was that Carew?" he said.

"Yes, indeed, it was; though none of us know'd it. You needn't look so skeared. He ain't annoyed with you; he's pleased, bless 'ee, and here's the proof of it."

"You may keep the guineas, Grange," said Yorke, gravely; "only keep my secret too. If he thinks I was a night-watcher, let him continue in that belief."

"Why, it's the best introduction to Carew as you could have!" insisted the astonished keeper. "You have only to go up to the great house to-morrow, and say: 'Here's the man as proved your match last night,' and—"

"You must allow me to be the best judge of my own affairs," interrupted the young fellow, haughtily; "so you will be so good as to say nothing more about the matter."

"Just as you please, Sir; and I am sure you are very kind," answered the keeper, slipping the coins into his pocket. "Squire hisself could not be more liberal, that's certain. You are tired, I see; and I wish you good-night, Sir, or rather good-morning."

"Good-night, Grange."

"Now, that's what I call pride," said Walter, grimly, as he closed the door upon his lodger; "and I am sure I hope, for his sake, it may never have a fall."

When Richard Yorke was thus left to himself he did a curious thing; he took out the life-preserver from its receptacle, and having made up the fire, placed it in the centre of the burning mass, so that in the morning there was nothing left of it save a dull lump of lead.

CHAPTER IV.

ACROSS THE THRESHOLD.

A day or two passed by, and nothing more was heard of Carew's combat with the young watcher; some other mad frolic had doubtless entered into the Squire's head and driven that one out. The hot punch imbibed after his swim in the Decoy Pond seemed to have averted all evil consequences, or perhaps he was case-hardened to such things. It was not uncommon with him to spend whole winter nights on a neighboring "broad," in pursuit of the mere-fowl that haunted it, in water or ice or swamp. He treated his body as an enemy, and strove to subdue it—though not for the good reasons of the Apostle—by every sort of harshness and imprudence; or rather he behaved toward it as a wayward friend but whom his child—at one time with cruel severity, at another with the utmost luxury and indulgence. No other man, probably, ever gave his heir so many chances of inheritance, or excited in him so many false hopes, as did the Squire of Crompton, who had no heir.

The hunting season had begun with him after its usual fashion; he seldom missed a meet and a fox, but turned one out of a bag to insure sport, or ran a drag over the most difficult and dangerous country that could be selected.

Yorke had almost made up his mind to take the keeper's advice, and discharge them all by putting his neck to the same risks as Carew, on horseback, in order to recommend himself to his master, when a sound occurred by which he divined his end is another way.

Tired of the park, wherein he had dwelled so long, and which every day the approach of winter made more bare and desolate, he had taken a solitary walk along the highway which led to the market-town. He was returning, and had reached the top of the long hill which rises at once began, and a high solid gate—so that no dogs could enter—gave access to that wild domain, when a thousand murmurs of the human race caused him to look back. For a mile or more the road was straight, and the leafless trees and hedges left the prospect open in all its directions; at the extremity of the road was some huge moving object, which, although at the great speed, disclosed the Squire's mail phaeton, drawn by four scattered stags, and followed at some distance by three or four mounted grooms, apparently unable to keep up with him. Carew himself was driving up this new conveyance at full cry, and, although he already outstripped the very wind, was having about him frantically with his whip, to keep the bill the flattened carriage wheels from overturning. The reason of this headlong speed was the shouts of applause evident by the appearance of a pack of hounds, which, followed by a numerous field in scarlet, was crossing the grass land in the hollow below. The spectacle, though weird and strange, was by no means without a certain grandeur and even barbarous pageant. Yorke understood the situation at a glance. He had heard the keeper say that, not content with his wild propensities within the park, the Squire had sworn to drive his stags one day into the market-town, and this he had doubtless actually accomplished; but, on his return, he had the misfortune to be caught sight of by one of his own pack of harriers, which were now in full pursuit of him, like another Actæon. The terrified stags, with that deep-mouthed menace of their natural enemies sounding in their ears, at once threw off all control, and had left their grooms behind in half a mile of headway. If only the harness held, they would be at the lodge gate in a very few minutes; but, on the other hand, the hounds were nearer at the moment which they were approaching diagonally. They were running, of course, by sight, not by scent; hounds, and with greyhounds' speed. Above their eager mellow notes, and the mad shouting of the excited sportsmen, and the continual yelping of the disregarded horn, above the thunder of his own wheels, and of the hoofs of the strange steeds upon the wintry road, rang out Carew's hoarse tones: "The gate, the gate!" If only that wooden wall could be interposed between his stags and their pursuers, all might yet be well. But, though the lodge-keeper had been drawn by the tumult to his door, the gate was like one amazed and fascinated by the spectacle before him, and paralyzed with the catastrophe that seemed impending.

"Gate, gate, you gaping idiot!" roared the Squire, with a frightful curse; but the fear of shaking wretch had not the power to stir; it was Yorke's friend who dashed at the gate and threw the long gate wide to let the madman pass, and then slammed it back upon the very jaws of the hounds. They rushed upon it with a solid wood like a living battering-ram, and howled with baffled rage; and some among the pack got their fore-paws over it, and would have got in yet, but that Richard beat them back with his horse hunter.

In the mean time Carew and his stags swept up the gate with a whirlwind, and, instead of coming to a corpse, the frightened creatures dashed into it, doubtless for cover, where wheel and rein and rather, tangling with trunk and branch, soon brought them to a full stop.

"Good lad!" exclaimed Carew, as Yorke hurried up to help him; "you are a good plucked one, you are; you shall keep the lodge, if your will, instead of that lily-livered scoundrel who was too frightened to move. Oh, I ask pardon; you are a gentleman, are you?"

"Sir, I hope so," answered the young man, stiffly, his anger only half subdued by the necessity for controlling it.

"Then, come up to the house and dine, whoever you are; I'll lend you a red coat. Curse those grooms! what keeps them?" One cast sit upon a stag's head to quiet him as though he were a horse. (Two of the stags were down, and butting at one another with their horns.) "What a pace we came up White Hill! I tried to time them, but I could not get my watch out. You moved yourself like a flash of lightning, else I thought we must have joined you against the gate. It was well done, my lad, well done, and I'm your debtor."

The Squire held out his hand, for the first time, for Yorke to shake.

"Why, what's this?" said he, peering into the other's eyes. "I have seen your face before, my friend."

"Yes, Sir; a week or two ago I played the part of night-watcher in your preserves—it was a mad prank; but"—and here the young fellow smiled ruefully—"it was better than poaching, you must admit."

"What!" cried the Squire, delighted, "are you the fellow that had that bout with me in the Decoy-Pond? Why, I thought you were one of my own men, and sent you something; but, of course, my scoundrels drank it. I'm glad to see you, Sir, by daylight. It was the uncertain moonshine that hampered me, else, by Jove, I'd have given you one, too." We must have it out another day, for a drawn battle is just the thing I like. What's your name, young gentleman, and where do you live?"

"I live close by, Sir; I am in lodgings for the present."

"Ay, ay, for the hunting, I suppose," said the impetuous Squire, turning to his dogs—devils of dogs; they are howling yet; they would have had my stags by this time but for you. Well, well; mind that for your promotion, and take up your quarters at Crompton; you shall have a hunter whatever; only don't be late for dinner—seven, Sir, sharp. Here are my keepers coming at last."

And, under cover of the fire of imprecations which the Squire poured upon his approaching subordinates, the young landscape-painter withdrew. He had obtained his end, and was free from all fear to retire before Carew should put that question to him for a reply—namely, our knowledge respecting his constitution has been steadily progressing. One wonderful discovery has been made since another, and the end is not yet. The spectroscope, new forms of lens have been successfully invented, give to science more remarkable facilities for observation. Astronomers turning over the tremendous interest of the wild progress of solar tornadoes, and record the results for the benefit of the race. Truly we live in a wonderful age!

It is almost time for the yearly plague of mosquitoes. This is said to be a good dose to give them: Take a piece of gum camphor about one-third the size of an egg, and evaporate it by placing it in a tin vessel, and holding it over the coal of a common fire until it does not ignite. The smoke will soon fill the room and expel the mosquitoes.

In 1834 Mr. Charles Dickens was offered one hundred pounds to give two readings on behalf of a large working-man's educational institute in Bradford, Yorkshire. The following letter was received from Mr. Dickens's secretary a few weeks afterward in reply:

"Mr. Charles Dickens desires me to say that he has not been able to reconcile it to his feelings to do what you require for nothing. He has, if you like to wait for next Christmas time, he will be very glad to do it for fifty pounds."

Accordingly, to the great satisfaction of the committee who had invited him, in bend, Mr. Dickens read "A Christmas Carol," on the 28th of December, 1854, in St. George's Hall, Bradford, to a crowded audience. He utterly refused to take any thing even for his own traveling expenses, and the institute realized a handsome sum.

An exchange recommends sprigs of arbor vitæ, oil box, wormwood, southernwood, and sage to be laid in the bed or wherever which are infested by those pests—black ants.

A lady who has long been a resident of San Francisco gives a curious account of the imitative powers of the Chinese. Coming to have her parlor painted, and not being able to procure the services of a paperhanger, she undertook it herself, and sent her Chinese cook, adjoining, and pointing to the wall inquired if he could paper that? "Sure, me do. He sighted the wall. Procuring handsome paper, and making the paste, she left him, with a countryman to assist, to begin the job, then went out to spend the day. Returning in the evening he informed her it was finished, and led the way for her inspection. The walls were papered, but it so happened that the room she showed him was an oilcloth, and the paper was laid on the floor. The rain, penetrating, had run down the walls in streaks, leaving the paper in a sad condition, in leaving unsightly stains of discoloration and mould. She had been cheated and wonderfully imitated as to hangings of green and gold, and the artist was evidently proud of his success.

At Saratoga it is the rule to drink a quantity of the waters mentioned in the morning. Some people, however, seem to have no idea of the propriety of drinking themselves sick, but exhibit a considerable capability of drinking as much in one day as should be a week's supply. The fitness had a decent time drank a day is rather too much even of a good thing.

The Medical and Surgical Reporter, in an interesting communication on the treatment of burns, after giving a list of remedies which are useful for immediate application to a burn, says:

"We have known the preference to carbolic acid and glycerine, in the proportion of from five to ten drops of the former to a teaspoonful of glycerine, with two ounces of the latter. Spread it on with a camel's hair brush, and the tissues will heal over the cavity, over which a rubber bandage is neatly adjusted to the parts, and the miracles of cure begin."

Among the Chinese woman is treated as a menial of the lowest order. She learns nothing except what will make her a good servant. She has no duty to be with her husband and sons. She is simply an article of furniture, to be purchased with considerable cost. It is usually on the principle of economy, as it is a man's wife, and the latter is the necessity of buying the other. If the Chinese live in this country, they will find that a different order of things prevails.

A wealthy arab ordered two magnificent book-cases of the finest Spanish mahogany bound volumes. He ordered that he was not particular as to what books were selected, but wanted only Waverley's novels, as he had read them highly spoken of.

AT the risk of inserting in this column a quotation which may not exactly suit our readers, we can not refrain from giving our readers the opportunity to read the following letter, which was written, in English, by a little boy only nine years old, to his father, Colonel Lewis Downing, principal chief of the Cherokee Nation, while the latter was in Washington on business. What wide boy of nine years could express himself with more simplicity and directness?

TAHLEQUAH, Feb. 1870.

"MY DEAR FATHER,—I have a little pony to ride. I go to school in the morning; in the afternoon I carry my lessons at home, and then take a ride on my pony. I know you would like to be with me now. I am sitting in my arbor, which is covered with vines. I have my little writing-desk in it, and a table, and a long bench, with my pail, tin cup, and comforter, where I take a nap when I feel like it. In one corner of the arbor is a bird's nest with four young ones chirping in it; the whole corner has my squirrel cage, where funny little Nero plays every day for me from its windows. The goose Gerard was the best squirrel I ever had, but the dogs killed him. In the other corner is my bookcase, with a glass door, where I can watch the busy little bees make their honey. At the door of the other arbor sits my dog. His name is Watch. Here I learn my lessons, speak my pieces, and write my letters and compositions; it is a very green study. I want you now to shut your eyes and see if you can not imagine you are here with your boy.

"Last week Harper had a picture in it of the Indian Chief Red Jacket, Seneca Tail, where it says, 'Red Jacket' (the name of the paper published in the Cherokee Nation). I hope that a great many will be invited to visit Washington. If the people of the United States were like the Indians in becoming civilized, they ought to send them to see us. They may think they can not become civilized people; but I have seen many of their Cherokee brothers, and remember that our capital, our schools, our churches, our farms, our cattle, our orchards, our fields of corn and grain, our comfortable houses, and our people, will show them what we tell them about us; and then they will think they can do as much as Cherokee Indians, and they will be glad to try to do like us. I hope that the President to send them through our country if he wishes them to become civilized. I will show them all my pictures, and glad for them on my organ, and do all I can to entertain them. I wish much that I would stop fighting and scapping, and learn to love God and do what is right. Your affectionate son,

"L. J. DOWNING."

There is a boy somewhere in Ohio who made a good item for a Cleveland paper by losing his cap by one non just as another boy touched it off! That was brought to be out only item in the way of the doctors got him around in a week or two, and then the lads, in trying to have a target gun, seized the cork down his throat, and the surgeons worked twenty-four hours to get it out. The Cleveland paper says the keep that boy on hand, and remarks: "That boy is invaluable for those men but neighboring towns need not try to hire or steal him, for I have him engaged."

One of the most remarkable medical cases of the age was that of Nathaniel Wilson, who lately died in Boston. He was born in Gilsum, Keene, and in a child, was ragged and healthy. When sixteen years old sixty-five "swelling could be seen, which progressed so that an extraordinary extent that he was known as the living skeleton, and exhibited as a wonder of the age. Medical skill was baffled, his appetite was good, and he would eat and kind of food; he possessed much natural strength, and his mind was above the ordinary. Within a couple of years, however, the health had failed, and he was confined to his bedroom, and a consumptive cough unfit his death. A post-mortem examination showed his right lung to be filled with abscesses, and the liver to be much diseased. He arms possessed but two and a half inches around at the time of his death.

A large amount of valuable property, estimated to be worth $60,000,000, and situated on Canal Street, in the city of New York, have come into the possession of two descendants of Robert Edwards, living in Gadsbury, Cheshire, England, conveyed to them on ground by King George of England to Robert Edwards, about two hundred years ago, the grant was made by Trinity Church, which to-day, by reason of that grant, is the wealthiest ecclesiastical organization in the world. The property was leased for ninety-nine years. This lease has expired, and the persons now in possession of the property will be compelled to hand it over when the heirs prove their identity.

The ships belonging to the German North Polar Expedition were all at sea in July; and nothing now remains but to hear from them until their return.

The taking of the cruses still continues to develop curiosities. A daughter of the Emperor Claudius has a census-taker that she had never yet told her age to any one. She had the marshal might put her in prison, yet she would refuse to reveal her secret. The census-taker was obliged to exercise his judgment. Reporting a decision of Lieutenant Governor Beverley to the residence of one of our wealthiest citizens, the census-taker met with a servant who remarked of the lady on whom seventy-five winters had left their impress. "She pon de front room?" inquired he. "Yes, honey and God Almighty, for he is every where." After having taken down the name of the mistress of the mansion: "Jet what I do, Sir? Sure it's not for the likes of me to be doing any thing, Sir; I am living only by the kindness of the ould lady in the Street of Charity. I bet my two fine boys in the army—God rest their souls!" He old lady of the house had a list of the names of hovels, but she herself was possessed of much taste and culture. She was the author of many pretty poems of considerable merit, but only a few had been published.

For the benefit of those who meditate spending some of the hot months in Alaska, we would mention that Mr. Cuykendorpeke Yakutskolimbike Sakiskityiltsakoosinge Kakeekoosklokoorte Kakeekoosklokoorte keeps an hotel at Sitka.

Mr. Sam Bing and Miss Gat Quill were the Chinese couple married in New York recently. Their names—Ehmo-Charles-Antoine-Gustave-Edouard-Theodule is the name of the gentleman who has left Ehmo.

A phrenologist—as the story goes—once asked leave to examine Mr. Dickens's head. The novelist sent the following answer in reply:

"DEAR SIR,—At this time I require the use of my skull; but when it is done with, be at leisure I will willingly place it at your disposal."

An intelligent colored man in Springfield has been to Richmond twice lately to bring colored workmen and their families to Springfield. They have come there to work in good families, shops, and hotels in that city. With the influence and example of these men we hope to be no lack of domestic help, and ladies may consider themselves on having better times in the kitchen.

A countryman walked into a wholesale drug store in Portland not long ago and noticed a barrel containing seed, as he supposed. Putting a handful in his mouth, he turned to one of the clerks and said: "Wuhk, now what kind of seed do you call them?" "Seed!" said the clerk; "those are not seed—they are cochineal." "Cochineal!" said the countryman; "what's cochineal?" "Why, they are a little bug," replied the clerk. "Bug!" roared the countryman, and he hastily left the premises, the crimson dye running from the corners of his mouth.

ARCHERY IN THE REGENT'S PARK.

DR. BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, who was in most respects one of the most practical and prosaic of men, cherished a pet theory of his own on the subject of bows and arrows, maintaining that archery, as a branch of warlike science, had a weapon of precision, and the bow, in the hands of a skilled archer, could doubtless be trusted to send a more certain message; but nowadays, what with Enfields, Needle-guns, Henrys, and Chassepots, this time-honored implement of warfare is never likely to regain its ancient importance. Lovers of the picturesque may be soldier who had experienced the sulphureous clouds and the ear-cracking thunders of the Wilderness, of Solferino, or of Sadowa.

The engraving represents the recent "Ladies' Match," in the grounds of the Royal Toxophilite Society, Regent's Park. The society consists of gentlemen, but ladies are allowed to practice ness it is to keep scores, to pick up arrows, and to make themselves generally both useful and agreeable to the fair archers here assembled. As in all there are twenty targets, there are ten sets of marks women and ten target captains. In the engraving the lady who holds her bow extended has just shot off her arrow, and is fallen into undue neglect, and that a corps of sharp-shooters, armed after the fashion of Cressy and Agincourt, would be no mean adversaries to encounter in the modern battle-field. There was more force in the doctor's arguments a hundred years ago than there is at present. The old Brown Bess musket could scarcely be termed pardoned for regretting the disuse of the bow as a weapon of war. Although even in the old days before the invention of gunpowder every battle of the warrior was with confused noise, as the Hebrew prophet tells us, yet the comparative silence and clearness of atmosphere upon an ancient field of strife would startle a modern every day except Friday, and once a year they have this match among themselves. Only ladies are suffered to participate in the shooting, and no gentlemen are permitted on that occasion to trespass on the ground where the contest takes place, except certain favored beings who are styled Captains of the Targets, and whose business it is to keep scores, to pick up arrows, and to make themselves generally both useful and agreeable to the fair archers here assembled. As in all there are twenty targets, there are ten sets of marks women and ten target captains. In the engraving the lady who holds her bow extended has just shot off her arrow, and is watching its flight; the lady in the fore-ground talking to the captain (who is in uniform, green coat, brass buttons, and green cap) is stringing her bow. The target from which they are shooting is not visible, as they stand five yards in advance of it. The shooting is at the ordinary distance, sixty yards.

THE HON. F. T. FRELINGHUYSEN, MINISTER TO ENGLAND.—[SEE PAGE 510.]

THE LATE M. PREVOST-PARADOL.—[SEE PAGE 510.]

THE RIVAL BREECH-LOADERS.

THE Prussian Needle-gun, tested at Sadowa on a grand scale, and the French Chassepot rifle, which did wonders at Mentana on a small one, are about to have their respective qualities put to a severer trial. The Needle-gun did more than conquer the Austrians at Sadowa. It kept France from intervening against Prussia when that power aggrandized itself by appropriating the territory of its helpless neighbors. It kept France from precipitating hostilities when BISMARCK refused compliance with the Emperor's demands in regard to Luxembourg. And but for the invention of the Chassepot rifle, which is claimed to be superior to the Needle-gun, it would have kept France back from the present war. A brief description of these celebrated weapons, of which we give engravings on this page, is especially appropriate at this time, when their qualities as implements of destruction are to be tested on so grand a scale.

THE NEEDLE-GUN.

The Prussian Needle-gun is the invention of HERR DREYSE, a gun-manufacturer, who spent thirty years in trying to construct a perfect breech-loading rifle that would be of practical use in war. The barrel is 36.06 inches long, and is rifled with four grooves down to the breech, where the chamber, or bed for the cartridge, is smooth and a little larger than the bore. The bed enlarges slightly to the rear, so as to admit the cartridge freely; and the lower part of the bore, for a distance of 6.17 inches, is enlarged so that the ball is gradually compressed into the grooves. The rear of the barrel is conical, and is called the mouth-piece. Over this part there is a six-sided cylinder, which holds all the mechanism of the piece. The air-chamber, next to the cylinder, has the needle pipe screwed into its breech. The cartridge is inserted at the rear, and the ignition is produced by the intrusion of a needle into the fulminate attached to the cartridge. The ball is sphero-conical, and the powder charge is 56 grains. The weight of this gun is less than 11 pounds. The mechanism can be taken apart without screw-driver, vice, etc. It can be safely and easily cleaned, and the gun being small, is particularly adapted for use in the contracted space of loop-holes, on horseback, etc. The objections to the Prussian Needle gun are, the danger of a weakening of the spiral spring, and the possibility that the needle may not be propelled with sufficient force to pierce the cartridge.

THE CHASSEPOT.

The French claim that this gun, which is the invention of M. Chassepot, is the most efficient weapon ever put into the hands of an army. It bears some resemblance to the Needle gun, but has this advantage over that arm, that its mechanism is much more simple and less liable to become clogged or to get out of order. The Needle gun, after it has been discharged several times in quick succession, becomes hot and dazzles the shooter, owing to the inability of the gas which comes back after the explosion of the cartridge to escape. The muzzle soon becomes hot, and the soldier is required to take his piece apart and clean it. The French gun is subject to none of these disadvantages. It allows the free escape of gas after each discharge, and can be cleaned from dirt or rust with very little loss of time. The Chassepot projectile is a rather long slug, with the end rounded and pointed like that of a ball. The cartridge, which is attached to it in a paper covering, is composed of a peculiar powder, specially manufactured for the purpose. At a distance at which this gun carries with certainty it is very considerable—over 1000 metres.

HON. F. T. FRELINGHUYSEN.

We give on the preceding page the portrait of the HON. FREDERICK T. FRELINGHUYSEN, who succeeds Mr. MOTLEY as United States Minister to England. Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN was born on the 4th of August, 1817, at Millstone, New Jersey. He was educated at Rutgers's College, graduated in 1836, immediately studied law, and in 1839 was admitted to the bar, where he rose to eminence and soon gave him a leading position. His political career began in 1860, when he was elected as a delegate to the Whig National Convention at Chicago. The following year he was appointed Attorney-General of New Jersey. He filled this position for five years with distinguished ability, and at the expiration of this time was appointed, immediately after the death of United States Senator WRIGHT, Governor WARD appointed Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN to fill the vacancy, and the appointment was confirmed by the Legislature at its next session. While in the Senate Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN served on the committees on Naval Affairs, the Judiciary, and Claims. Few Senators have made more favorable impression in a shorter time than did Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN; and, with the exception of Mr. ADAMS, we have had no other Minister in England who could be called his superior in knowledge of state affairs and natural abilities.

M. PRÉVOST-PARADOL.

On page 509 will be found the portrait of the late M. PRÉVOST-PARADOL, French Minister to the United States, who committed suicide, in a momentary aberration of mind, shortly after his arrival in this country.

He was born in Paris, August 8, 1829, of a marriage between M. PRÉVOST, an officer in the French army, and MLLE. PARADOL, an actress of distinction. His mother's brother was for his earlier years was remembered in one of the finest productions of his pen, a little book which he published, in 1857, "Du Rôle de la Famille dans l'Education," bears abundant testimony to the influence of home, and the watchfulness of maternal solicitude in directing his youth. At an early age he displayed unusual quickness of intellect and quickness at school, and received many prizes for high scholarship. When only twenty-six years old he became Professor of French Literature in the Faculty of Letters at Aix, a position which he occupied with a few months. In 1856 he engaged in journalism as the writer, alternately with M. LOUIS ALLOURD, of the leading articles, which appeared in "Premier Paris," of the Journal des Débats. In this position he exhibited remarkable power and facility of invention in the art of attacking the government, without saying any thing which would lay his paper open to prosecution. He likened the press of France, under the perpetual threat of "warnings," "suspensions," and imprisonment, exile, to the fair Scheherazade, who was compelled every night to furnish a story, with the expectation of being made the victim to the cord as soon as the sun and the Sultan should arise. So sweeping of these covert attacks became that at length the Journal des Débats received a private intimation from the government that the "Premier Paris" of that paper must no longer be contributed by M. PARADOL. Subsequently he attached himself to the Courrier du Dimanche, in which he carried on the same kind of journalistic warfare that made him feared in the columns of the Journal des Débats. The paper for many years vibrated between warnings, suspensions, and fitful issues. In June, 1860, he himself was fined 1000 francs and suffered a month's imprisonment for the publication of a political pamphlet entitled "Les Anciens Partis." The paragraph which caused the fine and imprisonment of the Courrier du Dimanche was from his pen. We append it as a specimen of the sort of writing dreaded by the Emperor of France:

"In GULLIVER'S voyage to the Flying Island the traveller is told of a great court lady, very beautiful, loved by a handsome man, who yet flies from her home to go out and live with a deformed footman. She is stripped and beaten; she sinks into deeper degradation from day to day; but she likes the footman. Gulliver is too form from her worthless lover. That story returns to my thoughts whenever I see France actively living beside to the voice of the Constitutionnel, and, in the midst of her destiny, lost in the vapors of lying oracles."

In America this would be considered very mild political writing; but Frenchmen take a keen delight in this kind of warfare, and the government is extremely sensitive to ridicule.

In 1863 M. PARADOL published three volumes of essays on political and literary subjects. His most important work is his "Etudes sur les Moralistes Français." In 1865 he was elected to the French Academy, and was received by GUIZOT. In 1868 he published a work of a satirical but recognizable tone on the government, entitled "La France Nouvelle." He was twice an unsuccessful candidate for the Corps Législatif.

During the late war in this country the symphathies of M. PARADOL were warmly with the South. On the evening of July 20 he purchased a pair of small pistols, while walking out with a friend, and went home to bed, having placed himself for bed, shot himself immediately over the heart. He left behind several notes, which proved that he had meditated suicide. A coroner's jury found that the act was committed while the deceased was laboring under temporary alienation of mind.

MUSCULAR EDUCATION.

THE rationale of training is to nourish the body as rapidly as possible, and at the same time get rid of the waste material. The first object is a good, for labor means, to the rapid consumption of fuel in locomotive engines by a quick draught of air, and the production of steam depends on an unusual extent of heated surface, obtained by exposing to the fire many tubes filled with water. The best of fuel is applied to the man in training in the shape of his meat, bread, and water; his smoke and ashes must be got rid of somehow; yet, so as to excite the fierce combustion demanded for the place he has to go, and the longcontinued efforts he has to make. To accomplish this, the fire-grate and chimneys of the human engine have to be kept in order by constant working order. The skin, which lets off the waste steam and smoke at millions of pores every twenty-four hours, is the chief one. Physiologists have paid the closest attention to the skin, whether in training habits or otherwise. The Greeks used a scraper called a strigil, and they sometimes anointed with the dust of the olive-ground anointing, all of which compelled them to use a great amount of friction in merely cleansing the skin. Friction is excited when the skin is in regular intervals; and the pores are cleansed by rubbing with hard brushes and towels, and by occasional sponging, though the bath is used sparingly. By this means also the circulation of the blood in the minute net-work of vessels all over the body is assisted. Men in ordinary health get rid of about three pounds of waste matter daily, but when hard in training it must be more than this. Then the lungs, being nearer to the central furnace of the body, are of the greatest importance to be kept at work than the skin; for from them the chief part of the waste matter is got rid of, besides a good deal of steam, or in other words, carbonic acid gas and watery vapor. In ordinary good health, and moderate about twenty-one ounces of steam daily; of course a man undergoing great exertion in training will have more than this. Then the light, fresh air is exchanged in breathing for the heavy carbonic gas, smoke, and watery vapor, and various animal substances, making altogether from six to eight per cent. of effete material got rid of in the day. Now we can see the necessity for a man having what is called "good wind;" his lungs must be sound, and his chest must rapid contraction and expansion, and the strong action of the heart in driving on the vital stream, without distress. Hence we see that the slightest weakness of the chest should ever attempt to train, though by moderate and gradually and gradually applied, would be beneficial; for it may then simply embrace the well-known precepts of fresh air, exercise, healthy food, no excesses, and early hours.

The delicacy of the trainers is open to criticism upon some points. They prescribe a dry meat diet, on the supposition that it makes the flesh firm, and keeps the blood from watery watery. This is quite an error; for we know that the strongest men are composed of as much water as other men, and that this apparently idle and harmless fluid is a most vital one, for it forms no less than seventy per cent. of the whole body. The muscles would be mere shreds if deprived of their water; and the singular thing is, that this is not easy to accomplish even in dead muscle, for the water is not contained as if by a sponge, but is not be squeezed out of the flesh except by a weight which destroys the fibre; therefore it is, essentially, what water is an essential constituent of muscle. The nerves, which are really the source of all muscular energy, actually consist of 800 parts water in 1000. Old Thales was not far out when he taught his pupils that water was the life of all creation. It is possible to live on water alone for some time, but unitedly deprived of it, death results in less than a week. The trainers are right, however, as to not taking liquids in large draughts; this is productive of flabbiness, and is liable to produce a chill or shock of a dangerous kind. It is not advantageous that strong, well-made men of sound constitutions, should not be quenched; but this should be done by small quantities taken while the system is heated, and not in large draughts immediately after the exertion is over. It will be found that water is by far the best beverage to be drunk during any strong exercise, as in long walks over hilly ground in hot weather, and in any of the more arduous feats of running and walking. Tea, if taken cool, is, however, a very light and stimulating drink; it allays the nervous system, and spirits are fatal to all great efforts. A diet of lean meat and bread, with scanty vegetable, is decidedly not favorable to robust health; experience has long taught us to follow the inclination for varieties of many kinds of wholesome food, even to efficient training, may be kept up by partaking of these, always excepting sweet meats and veal, which is not only immature but half diseased, from the poorness of daily bleeding which is adopted in the cruel process of rendering it delicacy. A diet in which flesh is the chief article is indispensable to our climate and our habits.

It can not be too strongly enforced that, no matter how intellectual the calling, or how sustained by mental excitement health lies at the root of all. The brain must have its fat and its phosphates, the heart must be touched with the bright and pure life-stream, and the pure begins to slacken, and the machinery yields to the ravages of time, and to long dead. It is not too much to say that the greatest achievements await those who, having pursuits not necessarily favorable to health, nevertheless make it of the first consideration to attend to the culture of the body. Good eating and drinking, as it is called, is far too much relied upon; in fact, it is this that in these habits are chiefly to disease and short lives; it is absolutely necessary to combine good food with invigorating and refreshing exercises, and all the more violent can be borne, so much the better. If gymnastics were esteemed with us as important as they are in the military schools of the Romans, and practiced habitually by them, there is no doubt that the public health would be raised, and new fields of enjoyment would open out to the multitude, who are always wondering what ails them, or what on earth they can find to do. Among the Greeks, it was thought impossible for the mind to be in a vigorous state unless the body was. Philosophy, physician, and gymnast were united in one person—Galen of Pergamus, the famous physician, was, in his dislocated his shoulder, when supervised the diet and training, he also superintended the fracture had its gymnasium; and here poets came to recite, philosophers to dispute, and the fashionable public to look on and gossip. The great contests were in running, jumping, leaping with weights in the hands, boxing, wrestling, throwing the discus (a sort of quoit-play), and hurling the spear. And these were practiced also by boys; and they had a favorite game of pulling a rope against one another. The gymnasium among the Romans became rather a place for military training; and the athletic sports changed into the fights of the gladiators, and combats with wild animals in the amphitheatre. The bath, however, with frictions of the skin and gymnastic exercises, was the delight of the Roman people, and their palestræ, which were richly adorned with works of art. The Roman boys were not trained as the children of the Greeks were, and gymnastics were certainly not so rigidly practiced for their own sake; the Romans preferred the magnificence and display of the circus and the amphitheatre. They would not have knocked a boy through life with a ball to welcome a victor in the Olympic Games, esteeming him too great a personage to enter by the ordinary gate as the Greeks did. Rough never have been a prey to the Goths had the been satisfied with the Greek model of the Roman Emperors, cast so they are in such a noble mould, would never have become the irritable, indolent, and malevolent race they are, and most athletic sports and manly exercises been lost by the people and disappeared from the world. Whether they will be regenerated by the example of their manly kings, and the enlightened exertions of their statesmen, is a subject of the deepest interest to all who admire the splendid organization of the Italians, and remember the deep debt we owe to Italy.

HEADACHE CURED.

THE sick and nervous headaches from which many suffer so terribly are not merely relieved, but permanently banished, by a resort to Seigel's Tru and Sulphur Powders. The proper course is to dissolve a powder in three tablespoonfuls half-hourly until the pain ceases, which will always be before the whole is consumed. Often one or two doses will be sufficient. The pain may possibly recur, but after this course has been adopted a few times the complaint will be entirely cured.

Sold by druggists. 1 Package, 12 Powders, $1; 3 Packages, $2 50. Mailed free. Money refunded if HALL & RUCKEL, 218 Greenwich Street, N. Y.

Two Novels of American Society.

I.

MY DAUGHTER ELINOR.

8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 75.

A good American novel, presenting life and society in the United States—the life that we live and the society of which we are a constituent part—has long been the desideratum of publishers and the readers of novel-readers. * * * A story in which the characters are types of the American people at large, differing from the same social representatives of other countries, and yet possessing in common with them a nature. "My Daughter Elinor" is devoted to attain a wide popularity, because thoroughly American, and verisimilitude the life that is sketched in. It is from such books that the historian gathers the habitudes of the age of which he writes. In "My Daughter Elinor" we have a real woman of flesh and blood, such as many a reader has made love to in the days of primitive juvenile. The style is easy and unaffected, and, without straining overmuch at epigram, and aphoristic rhetoric, flits into silhouhet: and the dialogue is rapid and natural. The descriptions of scenery are graphic, and pleasing with inevitable fidence. Mrs. Hackett is a fresh and delightful Mrs. Malaprop, and Ted Thomas is an original drawn from nature.—N. Y. Evening Post.

In some respects it will be justly regarded as the most successful attempt yet made to depict truthfully the aspects, traits, and tendencies—in a word, the normal characteristics—of our manners and social character.—Boston Transcript.

II.

MISS VAN KORTLAND.

By the Author of "My Daughter Elinor."

8vo, Paper, $1 00.

"Miss Van Kortland" is a fashionable, high-bred book, the best characters being such as "live, move, and have their being" in great cities—in this instance in New York—but which are individual enough and universal enough to be citizens of the world at large. We have never seen the best features of American fashionable life so well depicted as here; nor can we recall as lifelike a portrait of an American belle as Miss Van Kortland. She is a superb, womanly creature, of whose love any man might be proud. * * * Bright, lively, entertaining, with occasional touches of power, "Miss Van Kortland" is the finest American novel of the year.—N. Y. Tribune.

Harper's Bazar.

A REPOSITORY OF
FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most rapid and unequaled ever known in the annals of journalism, and is recognized as the best and most attractive family paper ever issued. As an illustrated chronicle of Fashion it is without a rival in this country. By a special arrangement, involving great expense, with the publishers of the Berlin Bazar—the leading journal of Fashion in Europe—its fashion-plates are published in New York simultaneously with their appearance in Berlin and Paris.

A SUPPLEMENT is issued with every week-day number, containing Miscellaneous Sketches, Tales, Poems, Biographical Sketches, and Gossip. The Editorial articles are always spicy, and cover every topic of social interest. No effort and no expense will be spared to permanently secure for this journal the victory which it has won so rapidly, and which it so well deserves.

The leading features of the beautiful Paris Costumes published in BAZAR, outside the regular Supplement, are the Models, drawn from life at the latest moment, with the names and directions for putting together, or printed on accompanying sheets. Each pattern will be sent, postage paid, to any address by mail on receipt of Twenty-five Cents and bust measure. Any number of patterns can be had from Paris. Dressmakers are supplied with the entire set of nine sizes at $2 00. Subscriptions may begin at the end of any month. In ordering, please specify the number of BAZAR containing set and what sizes wanted.

In the BAZAR for April 16 was commenced "The Double Chin," by the author of "Miss Van Kortland," to be followed by "Ned and Cecca," "The Dodge Club," &c., profusely illustrated.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and a commentary upon, all the important events of the time. Due attention is also given to topics of especial interest to women. The best talent in the country are permanently engaged in the department of Illustration, and the Publishers are constantly adding to the facilities for procuring the earliest views of America, Europe, and the East for prompt publication in the WEEKLY.

As a LITERARY JOURNAL, HARPER'S WEEKLY is recognized as the only illustrated newspaper which gives a complete and unabridged copy of every novel which it claims to pre-eminence.

The Editorial manner of HARPER'S WEEKLY constitutes one of its most prominent features: it includes weekly criticisms on Politics, Literature, Art, Commerce, and Miscellaneous topics.

Harper's Magazine.

The June Number began the Forty-first Vol. of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. Its success hitherto—attested by that of any other monthly periodical in Europe or America—is due to the variety and excellence of every part of its contents; to the enterprise of its Publishers in securing the best results of each year's work; to the fact that the English and American writers to whom the profusely-illustrated pages of HARPER'S MAGAZINE are indebted for the most valuable and popular treatment of its papers upon scientific and literary subjects have the improvements of the age, the most current topics, and to the variety and interest of its fiction constantly in view; to which must be added a new one has been added, viz., the Monthly Scientific Record, which will embrace upon which the past success of the Magazine has depended will still continue to be its controlling purpose. And it will be the object to confident that with increased attention to the wants of its readers the Magazine will be able to deserve even its present popularity.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from fifty to one hundred original articles in each number, and is profusely issued in the English language. Thus the ample space at the disposal of its Publishers will be found to treat fully of all the topics embraced in their plan.

COBLENTZ.

On a triangular point of land, at the confluence of the Rhine and Moselle, opposite the strong-hold of Ehrenbreitstein, lies the picturesque old town of Coblentz, or Koblenz, as its name is generally given on German maps. It is surrounded by powerful fortifications, and is connected with the fortress, on the right bank of the Rhine, by a bridge of boats. The railroad from Mayence to Cologne, on the left bank of the Rhine, crosses the Moselle on the massive bridge shown in our illustration. By means of this road, which runs entirely in German territory, troops can be massed with great rapidity at any point along the frontier where their services might be wanted. Usually Coblentz is a quiet town, with very little business; but now, with trains of soldiers constantly passing through, and all the bustle and excitement caused by the preparation for the great conflict, it must present a very lively appearance. The large building shown in our illustration was formerly the palace of the Bishop of Trèves, by whom it was built in 1778. It has been fitted up by the King of Prussia for a summer residence.

THE LONG BRANCH RACES.

On page 521 we give an engraving of the Hurdle Race which opened the first season at Monmouth Park, Long Branch, on the 30th ult. Our sketch includes a view of the Grand Stand in the centre of the Park, which is capable of seating 7000 persons. It is 450 feet long by 30 feet wide. Three Mansard pavilions, capable of accommodating 250 persons, rise above the steep French roof, and both the latter and the former are encased in variegated slates, laid in fantastic designs, so that the structure reminds one in no degree of the cheap and flimsy frame edifices generally erected on race-courses. The front of this structure is entirely open, so that from every seat the whole extent of the track is distinctly visible. The jagels, music platform, pool-stand, stables, and all other buildings appertaining to a race-ground, have been built after very light and tasteful designs, and they can all be seen from the Grand Stand.

Near the Grand Stand is a pleasant old farm-house, which, with excellent judgment, has been permitted to remain undisturbed, and forms an agreeable feature in the landscape. A little stream which run back of this farm-house has been widened into a monkey lake, with an area of about twenty-five acres. The Park gates are elaborately ornamented with appropriate designs. The track, exactly a mile in length, is a parallelogram with semicircled ends, and has the advantage of long straight sides and broad turns. It is eighty feet wide, well graded, and the soil is so hard that the heaviest rain has but little effect upon it. Taken altogether, Monmouth Park is certainly one of the finest race-courses in the United States.

TWO.

By HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

All in the deep and dewless dark
They watched the young moon's tender spark
Go down between the hills, and said,
The world is dark, and love is dead.

Two lovers in the star-lit gloom—
The hand below in drooping bloom:
The laden south wind blowing past,
Sweet with the rose it rifled last.

The rustling branches bowing down
Around them in a leafy crown,
A hidden bird, beside his nest,
Pouring the mystery of his heart—

After the peaceful river's flight,
Taking that burden of delight
Beneath the moving mystery
And dusky splendor of the sky.

Two lovers in that summer weather
Watching the lustre fade together,
All lately gay around them shed,
Yet life was dark, for love was dead.

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE WAR.

WHATEVER may be the chances of the war, whatever "glorious victories" may be won, its guilty author must not be forgotten. No success, however splendid, and no reverse, however signal, should be allowed to hide him. The public opinion of England and America lays the responsibility of all the consequences of the unfeeling inexpensible from such a contest upon the Emperor of France. It is doubtless in his opinion a just and terrible arraignment, and from a secret consciousness of guilt, that he has caused profuse explanatory declarations to be issued. But they have not been skillfully drawn, and have failed to arouse the sympathy and approval of intelligent neutrals any where. The pretexts originally advanced by the Emperor were puerile, as we showed last week. His ambassador was certainly not insulted by receiving the sign of which his country was the intentional solicitation; nor, under any recognized or practicable code of international courtesy, is one government expected to apply, enforced, the dictation of another. The feeling with which, under the circumstances, the declaration of war was received by intelligent public opinion, was one of utter and indignant amazement.

The French Minister of Foreign Affairs then made a declaration to the Senate. He said that France had advanced no other grievance than the HOHENZOLLERN candidacy; that this had been withdrawn, and that France had then, "in moderate terms," made "the moderate demand that the King should give a pledge for the future." But, as the epithet "moderate" is no argument, the case was not improved. Then came the Minister's circular to the French agents. In this he declared that Prussia threatened the balance of power, and that France had taken up its defense. That is very well, but the zeal of Prussia to promise that it would not prevent any HOHENZOLLERN from becoming King of Spain, disturbed the balance of power. This preposterous assertion was followed by the Emperor's proclamation, which is unmeaning except in the charge against Prussia of arousing distrust in Europe.

The real accusation, therefore, is that the European balance of power is threatened by Prussia, and endangered not by yielding to the choice of a Prussian prince by Spain, but by not promising that the never will do it. The cry of the balance of power is a phrase denoting the necessity laid upon great contiguous states to limit the disproportionate aggression of any one of them. But, if the possible candidacy of a HOHENZOLLERN, at any time, for the Spanish throne really menaced European repose, Russia, England, Austria, and Italy would be vitally interested in the question. They, however, evidently do not perceive any such menace to exist. Indeed, they have not been disturbed by apprehension at any period of the trouble. They declared their neutrality at once, and did not hesitate to do more than insinuate that they saw no cause for war. The balance of power, if threatened at all, is threatened for every European state. If only one declares it to be so, the presumption is that the declaration is a mere pretext. Nobody doubts that that of France is so. There is, therefore, not a single reason offered by the Envoy of Paris in 1866. And if we come to traditions, it is not to France nor to Celtic civilization that we owe the great muniments of American freedom. At this day, in France, most of those who call themselves republicans, and earnestly strive for the overthrow of LOUIS NAPOLEON, show as little comprehension of the vital and fundamental principles of liberty as the tyrants of '93. A century ago the French government, already rotten with the vices of despotism, which were about to plunge the country into revolution, recognized the independence of the American colonies, and substantially aided them. It was the chivalric magnanimity—it was sheer selfishness. It was not because the Bourbon government lived liberty, or the descendants of the Bourbons wished to encourage rebellion, but because it hated England, and would gladly see a power upon this continent that would hold it in check. And it was the Bourbon government in France, not the republic, which helped us. The republic did what it could to humiliate us. It is an American party flattered it because it called itself republican. Then came the BONAPARTE successor of the Bourbon despotism. He restored slavery in St. Domingo, and sold us Louisiana because he knew that he could not keep it for himself. And when slavery in the United States, incidentally strengthened by the expansion furnished by the Louisiana purchase, sought to destroy the republic, he lifted an empire based on slavery, the descendant of BONAPARTE lent it all his sympathy and aid, seizing the chance to supersede the Mexican republic by an Austrian empire.

Meanwhile, whatever the arrogance of the Prussian King, the recent political action of Prussia has been to transfer to itself the leadership of Germany which Austria had exercised since the last settlement of Europe. Is that a calamity for liberty? Prussia has also secured the independence of Italy. Do lovers of liberty decry her for that? She aims, unquestionably, at the unification of Germany. What else has been the dream and hope of the best Germans for a century? It is, therefore, because unification would make the old foe of all whom the representative of such tendencies and principles that SENATOR SUMNER defends the Prussian King. He says the CROWN PRINCE sternly suppressing republican movements in Prussia; it is the King refusing to yield to the mad requirement of the people of the victor of Jena, who imposed a fine of a hundred million of francs upon Prussia; it is the King resisting, in the name of humanity and civilization, the demand of the hereditary enemy of liberty and Europe, that a German republican of '48 with all his heart approves and defends.

MORE GNATS.

THE President of the United States, having left Washington in the interim of Congress, and at a most disagreeable season, for a rural retreat, is, of course, at once the object of partisan sneering. It appears, according to certain critics, that to go to the sea-side is unparalleled barbarism; to show the profoundest indifference to the state of the country and to the complications in Europe. So also, to pipe, like any day-laborer, and it was not supposed that he forfeited public confidence or respect by that indulgence. General GRANT is a most silent and simple and unassuming of men; but we doubt if the country regards his silence as indifference to the public welfare, or his tranquility as dull disregard of his official duty.

Nothing is so easy as to dog the footsteps of any man, and listen to every word he utters, and then to make spurt of him and them. Of all men who ever sat in the Presidential chair the most Democratic here, General JACKSON, was the most exposed, by his willfulness and ignorance, to this kind of ridicule. A letter of the General's was lately published which is certainly very comical, but it certainly does not diminish any sensible regard for him. This is the letter:

"The President, with his respects to the acting Secretary of the Navy, and requests him to write to the Secretary of the Treasury, that I request his written order as soon as his convenience will permit him."

What sparkling sport could not have been made of such a performance as this! How a complete official letter-writer might have been constructed to satirize the President! What a Democratic writer might not the Whig journals have deplored that the most illustrious station in the world was filled by a man ignorant of the most common forms of intercourse! To what solemn blatherskite over the degeneracy of parties and republic opinion might not the readers of that day have been treated!

The truth was that the people knew the President whom they had elected, and they did not expect him to excel in letter-writing. They therefore smiled and did not distrust him. It was not a matter of which one ought to be proud, as it is not a subject of pride to the State of New York that its Governor does not appreciate the proper difference between the words "shall" and "will." But if this were the chief criticism that could be made upon that officer, it would be indirect testimony to his official excellence. And when the country hears General GRANT elaborately and solemnly indicted for passing the hot weather by the sea, or for the want of an Addisonian grace in his letters, it is because it remembers that he has not passed every summer of his public service on the sea-shore, and is not wholly incapable of expressing himself with effective simplicity. Such places as Vicksburg, Chattanooga, and the banks of the James; and such expressions as, "I propose to move immediately upon your works;" and "I shall fight it out on this line, if it takes all summer," are not entirely unfamiliar to Americans.

THE RHENISH FRONTIER AND ALSACE.

AN interesting article in the Boston Traveller asserts that if France is trying to push her frontier to the Rhine, she is only seeking to recover what was hers under NAPOLEON I., and what was wrested from her without war, on the other hand, Prussia means to wrest Alsace and Lorraine from France, provinces which have been hers by right for a hundred and sixty years and a hundred and thirty-five years. If FRANCE, the Traveller argues, were to obtain the Rhenish provinces, she would not be stronger relatively to Prussia than she was four years ago, before Prussia's enlargement had disturbed the equilibrium. France, while she would not should obtain Alsace and Lorraine, she would become so menacing that a new general alliance must be essential to preserve order.

To this it may be answered that, if Prussia had picked a quarrel with France upon the ground of Spanish Queens' wall and determine how he would act in a possible contingency which had not arisen, the verdict of the world would be that Prussia was the aggressor as it now is against France. And if, under cover of such a pretense, Prussia had proceeded to invade France with a view of intimidating to conquer and retain them, she would be as guilty as France now threatens to be. Or, again, if a war had been provoked between that Prussia, upon what were acknowledged to be valid grounds, and, after hard fighting, the Rhenish provinces had been conquered by France in a fair fight, that they would undoubtedly have been general acquiescence.

But this is not the situation. Personal reasons have persuaded LOUIS NAPOLEON to declare war. The firmness of his declared pretenses will, as elsewhere considered, be invokes a horrible calamity upon Europe for no sound reason. By all the acknowledged principles of international law, if he should be beaten, he can not complain if he should be compelled to pay the penalty of his crime by a loss of territory. If it be urged that it would be very hard to make France suffer for the offenses of its ruler, the answer is that France acknowledged no regret at his crime, and that every people must suffer for the acts of those whom they permit to rule them. It is true, also, by our principles, that a Bourbon would have done what the BONAPARTE hopes to do. That, indeed, shows one to be no better than the other; but it does not justify the conduct of either. And even supposing that Prussia had engaged in a peaceful intrigue to place a HOHENZOLLERN upon the Spanish throne with the consent of the Spanish people, and that the intrigue had been successful, it does not follow, by any principle, that a Bourbon would have been dangerously increased; not that her conduct would have justified a war by France, or would have been regarded by Europe by conquering the Rhenish provinces. The people of Spain have as plain a right to elect a HOHENZOLLERN as the people of France to elect a BONAPARTE emperor.

The Traveller, therefore, imagines a wholly different situation, and that LOUIS NAPOLEON really exists. If the simple question were proposed whether the peace of Europe would be more threatened by the occupation of the Rhenish frontier by France than by that of Alsace and Lorraine by Prussia, there would still be a great many considerations to be discussed. And even supposing that war between two such hostile and adjoining nations was sooner or later inevitable, and that upon the whole the Rhenish frontier offers the best security of European peace, war would still not be justified by any reason which was not satisfactory to the public opinion of the world; and there is no pretense of such a reason now.

FENIAN EXHILARATION

THE prospect of a war is full of exhilaration to the Fenian brethren. They have been busily declaring their sympathy with that eminent friend of man, liberty, and Ireland, the Emperor of France. One eloquent gentleman at a French meeting held at Delmonico's was as lavish in his promises as he was ardent in his expletives. He announced that, "if" this was a war between the SAXON and Celtic races,

"ve" accept the challenge. Delmonico's fairly rocked with the tremendous enthusiasm that greeted this remark. The tables thundered. The glasses rattled. The scene and the sound must have been equally enlivening. When the feelings of the meeting permitted, the exuberant orator proceeded. But one of his hearers, who had been too deeply pledging the health of the French imperial apostle of peace, began to interrupt in the English language, which was imperfectly understood by the meeting, and the chairman was hustled out. Then the gushing Fenian continued; but also in the same unknown tongue. This made trouble. But when he acclaimed, "We are with you, men and money," the prospect of the aid of the Fenian military chest was so reviving to the spirits that tumultuous cheers again arose until the welkin rang.

Before yielding to the evident wish that he should sit down, the orator continued, in the same strain: "The Germans propose to send men over; we will do the same. Here, again, torrents of enthusiasm broke loose. And with one final effort the speaker declared, "If" the United States connives at the sending of assistance from these shores to France, "we will send a million of men, if necessary, to fight for France. The force of Fenian eloquence could go no further. It was characteristic and delightful. One thing only was lacking, and that was to have declared that "if" the Prussian armies were assisted by the United States, the identical Fenian gentleman then visibly participating in the flesh before the eyes of assembled France in Delmonico's, would be one of five million Fenians to depart by the next steamer for the seat of war.

THE DICKENS AUCTION.

WHY the most interesting and personal objects left by Mr. DICKENS were immediately sold at auction does not appear. There were many things in the collection which were peculiarly associated with him, and some which had a tenderly exceptional value. But there seems to have been no discrimination. Every thing was brought to the hammer. The pictures that were presented to him, and had no other interest, said to him, which were painted by famous artists to illustrate his works, shared the same fate. But really an explanation is due of the sale of MACLISE'S portrait for $105. The attachment between the author and the artist was long and most affectionate. DICKENS'S letters to MACLISE were a tribute to one of the R. A. Dinner on the 24th of May, he said: "For many years I was one of the two or three intimate friends and constant companions of the late Mr. MACLISE." In a few beautiful and touching words he continued affectionately describing the character of the friend whose portrait of DICKENS himself is so familiar. Scarcely is DICKENS dead, when this portrait is sold at auction as a curiosity and disappears. Was there such a pressing necessity for parting with it? We look in vain in all the columns of the sale for an explanation of this extraordinary proceeding.

The auction itself served to show how kindly the memory of DICKENS is cherished. The rooms were crowded not with private and personal friends, but with the readers and lovers of the author, that vast invisible phalanx of his great popular writer, of which he can not think but with awe and pathos. How conscious of his sensibility to all his friends' likes and dislikes was is constantly evident in his books. And that they not only admired the author, but loved the man, as the unparalleled tributes to his memory prove, shows how deeply he had impressed the world with the sincerity of his declarations. I have always had and always shall have an earnest and true desire to contribute, as far as in me lies, to the common stock of healthful pleasantness and enjoyment, and believe that Virtue shows quite as well in rags and patches as she does in purple and fine linen."

THE QUESTION OF FRENCH FAILURE.

THE publication of the secret treaty which the French Government proposed to that of Prussia suggests the inquiry how many more such secret projects of LOUIS NAPOLEON are likely to appear? Meanwhile the treaty itself throws a curious light upon the French Emperor, and invites consideration of the personal consequences of failure in his present monstrous enterprise. The project of the treaty recalls the beginning of the century, when Napoleon carved out, however, consulting other people, arrange the map of Europe to suit himself. Was there ever such hearing as LOUIS NAPOLEON, or such an opportunity squandered? His first and clearest perception should have been that he could not be his uncle; and the second, that his uncle could not do in 1870 what was practicable sixty years before. In looking back over the nephew's career, and in reading such a summary as that of EDMOND ABOUT'S, which is merely the history of the second empire, KINGLAKE'S contemporaneous estimate of NAPOLEON seems to be justified. He has meddled every where, but has touched nothing with the hand of a master. At the end of twenty years he has alienated every power; not one is friendly; not one cares to be his ally; not one has some especial grudge against him.

The confidence of Frenchmen has so declined that he has felt himself obliged to instigate Casarism by certain concessions to constitutional freedom. But the discussions at the time of the Plebiscite showed how grudging those concessions were. The governing power is secured upon him; he alone amends the fundamental law which he has himself enacted; and he declares war. The result of the Plebiscite showed that there was no wise organization of the liberal sentiment in France, and the truest liberals voted for him in the unhappy alternative offered them. But had the vote been, in any proper sense, free, the Imperialists would be to-day the strongest ruler in the world. While, in fact, there is nobody who does not think that nothing is more serious than the peaceful succession of his son.

The telegraph, in the few days immediately following the reception of the Ollivier ministry with the tidings of the reported enthusiasm of the French population. But the speech of THIERS in the article of the Revue des Deux Mondes and Debats, and the statement of the Tribune's correspondent, corrected the delusion, and it was evident that the Emperor was not at the head which is manufactured to order, upon great occasions, by the police. It is plain, therefore, that without the support of an army which can be lent to the war but in victory for France, she spoke with an instinctive consciousness that failure would be fatal to her hushing of the public consciousness which will make LOUIS NAPOLEON reckless to the last. A signal defeat would certainly dismay the whole French people, and a defeat, also, promises for France a situation not agreeable to contemplate. The system of Chauvinism is not so alternative but anarchy; and it will be sad and discouraging indeed if the experiment of the empire does not prove to all intelligent Frenchmen that the true empire of ress can not now be permanently secured in that country but by a free constitutional government.

NOTES.

THE ocean yacht race was very closely contested, and although yacht racing is not a sport it is very remarkable that the American yacht, the Dauntless, was about two hours behind, and that on the second day out the last boat was in fact behaving to a save two men, who were unfortunately drowned. Every thing seems to have been "fair and square," and, as usual, in the "international" matches, nothing whatever is determined by the result. It is not proved that the model of the Cambria is finer than that of the Dauntless, nor that her sailing qualities are superior, nor that English seamanship is excellent. The only evident conclusion is that, upon the whole race, the American yacht was slower. The disappointment among American yachtsmen was undoubtedly very great. Reasons were assigned for the superiority of the Dauntless did not win, but they were no more satisfactory than those which the political friends of BUTLER, the fat fact in the latter case is that the other party had more votes, and in the former that the English yacht came in first. But, although the prestige of success rests with the Cambria, it is not to be considered the equality of the vessels under the circumstances, shows the Dauntless to be as fast a sailer. And in that conclusion we ought all to be happy.

THE HARPERS have just published a correct, lent and timely volume of the "Speeches, Letters, and Sayings of Charles Dickens," with a sketch of the author by GEORGE GILFILLAN, and JOHN STANLEY'S sermon in Westminster Abbey. MR. SALA says that he was as illiterate as blind child. Mr. DICKENS himself says, in writing but of a retentive memory. The solace of his life was to hear his sister read "Pickwick" to Boz," and when he recovered his sight, it was from "Pickwick" that his sister taught him to read. The first DICKENS periodical was the Pic Nic was 1836, and "in literature served him fully-fledged as a lecturer." MR. SALA'S sketch is very interesting, and will be very useful in its detail of facts to any biographer of the novelist. His praise of his master is fervid and boundless. As for the speeches of DICKENS, which were most of dinner speeches, their fame is founded on that of models of their kind. Exuberant, flowing fanciful, humorous, earnest, generous, and grace ful, they were always delightful to hear. Neither too trivial nor too serious, they struck the happy mean of feeling and good sense. It is impossible to open them any where without perceiving the cheery spell of his genius and admiring its unparalleled facility. The letters, sparkling, and the sermon of DEAN STANLEY is a fine and thoughtful tribute to a great social teacher, and, by implication, a noble rebuke of those who have been gibing at him over his grave.

ALTHOUGH MR. MOTLEY has been recalled, his country certainly has no reason to be dissatisfied with him. He has not been allowed to open the Alabama negotiations, but he has concluded the treaty which involves the subject of indefeasible allegiance, and according to the most honorable American traditions and policy. During his brief official term no other great question has been discussed. When the war began in 1861 Mr. MOTLEY was in Europe, and his letters published in the good exact; and his explanation and defense of the Union cause, both in private circles and in the Times, was so vigorous and hearty and conclusive that the English sentiment which was hostile to this government did not forgive his trenchant eloquence. That sentiment preferred the cautious reserve of the Democratic Minister at the time, Mr. DALLAS. When Mr. MOTLEY appeared as the successor of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON his official presence was a declaration of the English friends and allies of the rebellion that the United States proposed to maintain the principles for which they had fought and which they had established. This was intensely disagreeable both to the English people and to their American friends. As Minister, Mr. MOTLEY'S public course has been truly dignified and American. The duties of honorably have been discharged with characteristic grace and urbanity. The newspapers of the party of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON have taunted Mr. MOTLEY as Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON have taunted Mr. MOTLEY as a snob. A snob is defined by the best authority as one who admires things meanly. Those, therefore, who loudly praise Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON, who have always lived in a position of honor before the aristocracy that had hoped for the destruction of his country; and Mr. BUCHANAN, who appointed a Democratic Minister at the Court of St. James was acting as bottle-holder to the SLAVOCRACY, who conspired to secure the extension of slavery; and Mr. DALLAS, who yielded without even a protesting sigh to the hopes and sneers of the British aristocracy against the Union—those who praise these American Ministers to England are delivered from accusing their successor of snobbery. Mr. MOTLEY at home and abroad, as one of the most eminent scholars of his own country, and one of its most honored and conspicuous representatives in Europe, has been always true to what is noblest and most characteristic in the American principle and tendency; and, despite the bitter taunts of party spirit, he will rise in the public mind as Mr. ADAMS, will probably be quite as honorably remembered, both as man and as gentlemen, as the three famous Public Ministers to Great Britain.

AMONG the new lecturers for the year will be MR. RICHARD GRANT WHITE, whose scholarly accomplishments are familiar to all readers, and MR. GEORGE P. PUTNAM. The latter is the most popular and famous of all the literary works of the war. MR. WHITE'S lecture will be on "Words and upon the use of the English language have been universally remarked for their careful and shrewd observation and discriminative illustration. He will probably select some of the literary subjects which he is so able to treat with force and roughness and popular interest; and we welcome him heartily into the growing brotherhood of the platform.

We are glad to observe that the good cause of the rights of travelers continues to advance and to triumph. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has decided that a personal injury from an accident upon a railroad train is presumptive proof of negligence, and that the company must prove that it is not guilty of its own negligence. This is much more sensible than the general English rule, that the passenger to prove that it was the result of such negligence, which he could not certainly know. Last November, MR. HENRY WARD BEECHER, a passenger upon the steamer Bellona, published a letter, showing her unfitness for the sea. Other letters of his friends in the New York Globe, were sent to the agents and owners, and led to promises of reform. Upon this the Bellona was broke her shaft, and MR. WILLCOX returned to the charge. The ship was ordered to sail again about this time, but her name has disappeared from the advertisements, and she has been sold for other service. Publicity is an admirable purge of abuses.

IN a recent interview with the editors of French newspapers, M. OLLIVIER assured them that the Emperor never approved or accepted the project of a non-defensive secret treaty alleged to have been drawn up by Count BENEDETTI, and that BISMARCK'S prompting idea was actually that of a defensive alliance. Meanwhile, Count VON BISMARCK publishes in the Berlin Anzeiger his version of the project, which flatly contradicts the statement of M. OLLIVIER. Assuming the German account of this affair to be substantially correct, there seems to have been bad faith by BISMARCK into submitting propositions to the Emperor which were monstrous and extreme had no intention of agreeing, but which he foresaw could be used to advantage against the Emperor in the event of war.

THE Tribune recently published some very surprising statements in regard to crime in New York, well calculated to shake our faith in the old-grown belief that we are "well off." These returns for the year 1865 show that in the city of New York there were 71 cases of murder, and 71 clear cases of homicide, while only 33 persons were arrested for these crimes, and the records of the courts show only 15 convictions. That is to say, of the perpetrators of unmistakable murders, more than 50 per cent. were arrested, and more than 80 per cent. went unpunished. The readiness with which the knife and pistol are used in New York to settle the most trivial disputes is, perhaps, explained by these remarkable statistics. Mr. HORACE REYNOLDS, who ran for from right in believing that hanging "was played out" in New York.

GENERAL SHERIDAN sailed recently for Europe, to observe the operations of the French and Prussian armies. Both governments, however, have decided to refuse military officers of foreign powers permission to visit their respective camps; and probably no exception will be made in the case of General SHERIDAN, notwithstanding the fact that this country is not liable to be drawn into the contest, as England or Austria may be.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ocean yacht race between the Dauntless and the Cambria ended July 31, the Dauntless arriving at Queenstown harbor at 10 o'clock on Sunday morning, an hour and forty minutes ahead of her rival. The voyage of more than three thousand miles this is probably the closest race ever sailed. The Dauntless was thrown over three hours by accidents at sea, and lost two of her company overboard.

A terrible railroad disaster occurred in Texas July 14 between a cavalry force of fifty men, belonging to the 6th U. S. Cavalry, under Major MCCLELLAND, and two hundred Mexican soldiers, thought to belong to the Ocampo and Kinney band. The Mexicans were completely routed, leaving forty-eight dead, eighty-six badly killed and eleven wounded. The Indians were among the Mexican ranks.

There are more troubles in Utah. Mr. George Crosby, a Gentile merchant, was shot at Brigham Young, was recently found dead at Salt Lake City, under circumstances which point to the suspicion of foul play. At a reception recently given there to General Augur by the Mormon authorities, a large epic called Polly was sung in front of the house, insulted those within, and finally broke the windows.

The murder of Mr. Nathan Bedford was committed in this city on the morning of July 26, and the murderer, Mr. Thomas Nudd, was arrested. Mr. Nudd alleges that Mr. Bedford was a gentleman of very great wealth and high social position, and that the latter had first tried to kill his wife in his residence at No. 12 West Twenty-third Street, near Fifth Avenue, and had then attempted to kill himself. Mr. Bedford, in the statement of murder being a heavy iron bar, known by students' slang as a "jimmy." Mr. NATHAN, who is a perfect health on Thursday night, and the murder was not discovered until the next day. Public opinion is the most remarkable feature of the tragedy is that, though Mr. Bedford was a man of high social position and wealth, and though the murder was committed in his own house during the night, Mr. Nathan has met with unusual sympathy and support. Mr. Nudd, on the other hand, has had no satisfactory theory in regard to the murder has yet been developed. Mr. Nathan was a gentleman of large benevolence and pure life, and is not known to have had an enemy in the world.

General John O'Neil, of the Fenian army, who was arrested in Vermont for violation of United States laws in the movement on the Canadian border, has been sentenced to pay a fine of one thousand dollars and to be confined for the term of six months in the crime the services he had rendered the country in the war with Mexico. Judge ADAMS, who presided at the trial, was also entrusted to imprisonment—one for nine and the other for six months.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE Emperor of France set out from St. Cloud July 28 to join the army, and arrived the same afternoon at Metz. On the 29th he reviewed the troops, who were enlisted. Just previous to his departure he addressed the following letter to the commander-in-chief of the Garde Nationale of Paris:

"I am glad to take this opportunity to express on my part to the Garde Nationale of Paris the confidence I have in its patriotism and devotion. At the moment when a portion of the army of the line I have to leave Paris with the confidence which I repose in its well and ability to maintain order. It is the first condition for the security of the regency of the Empress. It is becoming to the dignity of nations, according to the manner in which they, shall add to the safety of the country."

The Empress Eugenie issued a proclamation, and the Emperor issued the following proclamation to the army:

"I am about to leave to take my place at your head, to defend the honor of the soul of our country. Upon the first encounter will rest the fate of our arms. The enemy is numerous, but our soldiers are valiant as this have not been able to resist your shock. I count on you to do your duty. The war which you are going to make be long and hardly contested, for its theatre will be the scene of former victories. You will find there traditions; but nothing is beyond the preserving efforts of our soldiers and Africa, Italy, and Mexico. You will prove once more what the French army is able to accomplish when it unites the impetuosity of the national with by discipline, influenced by love of country. Whatever may be the result, success our fatherland will find here its glorious reason of our fathers, and we will show ourselves worthy of them. Soldiers, I shall follow you with all my heart. I shall be with you day and night. Watch over my son. Upon our success depends the fate of liberty and the future. Let us march, and with the help of the God of battles will be with us. NAPOLEON.

"Given at the Palace of St. Cloud, July 28, 1870."

"Given at the Palace of St. Cloud, July 28, 1870."

King William of Prussia has also taken his place at the head of his army. On leaving for head-quarters he issued a proclamation to the people of Prussia and the North German States, in which he gives to fight for the honor of Germany, and calls on the whole nation to unite.

A Berlin dispatch states that the French attacked the Prussians in a large force on the morning of August 2d, but were vigorously repulsed.

A Paris dispatch of the 3d announced a skirmish, which took place July 30, give some indication of the relative forces of the French and Prussian armies. It states that the Prussian bullets fell a hundred metres short in a wood, and that consequently the French were obliged to withdraw. The same dispatch says:

"At an interview with the Parisian editors M. Ollivier declared that the Emperor had no intention of the publication of accomplished facts. At Metz several newspaper correspondents, chiefly American and English, were recently arrested as spies. They were soon liberated, however, on the order of the chief of staff of the army in future.

The question of neutrality by England has caused bitter disappointment in Germany, and the German papers are loud in their denunciation of Lord GRANVILLE. They assert that England has purchased her neutrality by the sale of Heligoland to Prussia. The London Times declares that England supplied Belgium with cartridges to slaughter Germans.

Austria is making formidable war preparations, as she fears the infringement of her neutrality by Bismarck. The movement of the Austrian army of observation will be given to the Archduke Albrecht, whose reputation as a general is unrivaled. The Austrian corps is also to be organized, the Chambers at once having voted an extraordinary credit for that purpose.

GENERAL FOREIGN ITEMS.

Two British gun-boats have started for the port of Apia, to demand satisfaction for the outrages there committed. The foreign residents of Shanghai have been warned to leave for an approaching storm with the same destination. The French will send a naval force to the Levant from Bulgaria, and the struggle to be inevitable.

The British government, it is stated, have entered into a contract for 300 American cannon.

The Spanish Government has ordered Japan an indemnity of $20,000 for the murder of a Spaniard, and in the case in which 1400 persons were slaughtered.

The Spanish Cortes met on Monday, July 25, at Madrid, to vote, in reply to a demand for the Infanta's coronation, a proposal that the negotiations should where they did eighteen months ago, and that, America having declined the offer made by England, the next advance was due from the United States.

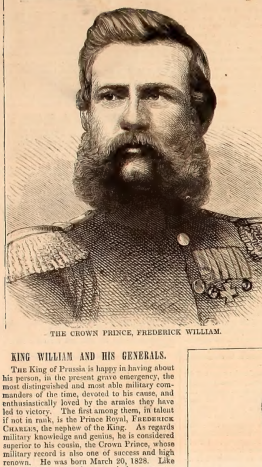
Ninety persons were killed and many wounded by a recent explosion in a colliery at Llansamlet, Wales.

Rumors are current in London that, unless the Republicanity doctrine is considerably qualified, American will be refused admission to Ireland.

The official journal of Vienna announces the suppression of the concordat between Austria and Rome, and that Austria has thus been liberated of the action of the Austrian government.

The twenty-fifth city of London has just been conferred upon M. De Lesseps.

Blessed Adam will, it is said, replace the late M. Fandel in the French Academy.



THE CROWN PRINCE, FREDERICK WILLIAM.

Bohemia, Prince FREDERICK CHARLES, who knew the Austrians to have occupied a formidable position on the heights beyond the Bistritz, requested the Crown Prince, FREDERICK WILLIAM, to come to his assistance with the Second Division of the army, but attacked the enemy on the morning of July 3, without awaiting his arrival. The Prussians fought desperately, but the position of the enemy was so well chosen, and their artillery so favorably placed, that the Prince could not gain a decided advantage over them, and it was not until the arrival of the Second Division, under the Crown Prince, that the enemy lost ground, retreated under the deadly fire of the Prussians, and was finally completely routed, running in all directions, and in the wildest confusion. Thus ended the celebrated battle of Sadowa."

In the present war the Prince commands the Army of the Rhine.

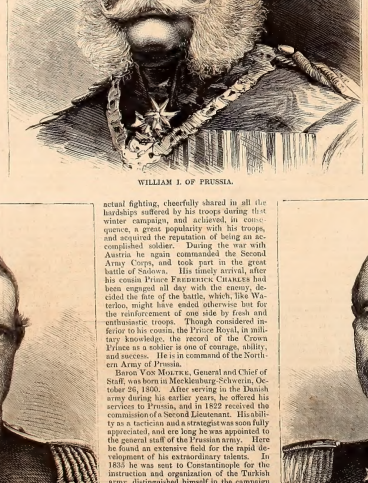
The CROWN PRINCE, FREDERICK WILLIAM, only son of WILLIAM I., and heir to the Prussian throne, was born in 1831. At the age of seventeen the Prince was sent to the University of Bonn. At the conclusion of his university career he was recalled to Berlin, and began his military studies as a private in the Guards, as rank affords no exemption from the strictest military service in Prussia. Prince and peasant stand upon the same footing in this respect—with a difference, however, in the matter of promotion. After a short term of service in the ranks he received command of a company, and rose by rapid promotion to the grade of General. In 1858 he married the eldest daughter of Queen VICTORIA. As Lieutenant-General and Commander of the Second Army Corps, the Crown Prince took part in the Schleswig-Holstein war, in which the little kingdom of Denmark was despoiled; and, though not engaged in actual fighting, cheerfully shared in all the hardships suffered by his troops during the winter campaign, and achieved, in consequence, a great popularity with his troops, and acquired the reputation of being an accomplished soldier. During the war with Austria he again commanded the Second Army Corps, and took part in the great battle of Sadowa. His timely arrival, after his cousin Prince FREDERICK CHARLES had been engaged all day with the enemy, decided the fate of the battle, which, like Waterloo, might have ended otherwise but for the reinforcement of one side by fresh and enthusiastic troops. Though considered inferior to his cousin, the Prince Royal, in military knowledge, the record of the Crown Prince as a soldier is one of courage, ability, and success. He is in command of the Northern Army of Prussia.

PRINCE FREDERICK CHARLES.

KING WILLIAM AND HIS GENERALS.

THE King of Prussia is happy in having about his person, in the present grave emergency, the most distinguished and most able military commanders of the time, devoted to his cause, and enthusiastically loved by the armies they have led to victory. The first among them, if talent if not in rank, is the Prince Royal, FREDERICK CHARLES, the nephew of the King. As regards military knowledge and genius, he is considered superior to his cousin, the Crown Prince, whose military record is also one of success and high renown. He was born March 20, 1828. Like all Prussian princes, he entered the army at a very early age—he was scarcely ten years old; and his innate love of every thing connected with the army soon became apparent in the rapid progress he made in the military school of instruction. The study of the life and glorious deeds of FREDERICK THE GREAT filled his leisure hours, and it is said that he was on several occasions severely reprimanded for passing entire nights over the history of the "Seven Years' War" and the study of the plans of battle adopted by that illustrious captain. He distinguished himself in the Schleswig-Holstein war, but won his highest renown in the late war against Austria. A distinguished military writer, describing this campaign, says of the Prince:

"At the outbreak of hostilities between Prussia and Austria in 1866, Prince FREDERICK CHARLES was called to the command of the First Division of the Prussian army, immediately marched his troops to the frontier, which he crossed on June 23, and, in ordering the attack upon the forces of the enemy, addressed his men with the words, 'May your hearts beat toward God and your fists upon the enemy.' A succession of splendid victories at Liebenau, Turnau, Podol, Münchengrätz, and Gitschin, having forced the enemy into the interior of



WILLIAM I. OF PRUSSIA.

BARON VON MOLTKE

As a consequence, a great popularity with his troops, and acquired the reputation of being an accomplished soldier. During the war with Austria he again commanded the Second Army Corps, and took part in the great battle of Sadowa. His timely arrival, after his cousin Prince FREDERICK CHARLES had been engaged all day with the enemy, decided the fate of the battle, which, like Waterloo, might have ended otherwise but for the reinforcement of one side by fresh and enthusiastic troops. Though considered inferior to his cousin, the Prince Royal, in military knowledge, the record of the Crown Prince as a soldier is one of courage, ability, and success. He is in command of the Northern Army of Prussia.

Baron VON MOLTKE, General and Chief of Staff, was born in Mecklenburg-Gewerin, October 26, 1800. After serving in the Danish army during his earlier years, he offered his services to Prussia, and in 1822 received the commission of a Second Lieutenant. His ability as a tactician and a strategist was soon fully appreciated, and ere long he was appointed to the general staff of the Prussian army. Here he found an extensive field for the rapid development of his extraordinary talents. In 1835 he was sent to Constantinople for the instruction and organization of the Turkish army, distinguished himself in the campaign of the Sultan against the Viceroy of Egypt, and returned to Prussia rich in honors and experience. He made rapid advances in the army, until he was definitely appointed Chief of Staff in September, 1858, in which position he has remained up to the present day, and has rendered such services in his reorganization of the Prussian army, the skilful planning of campaigns and all military operations, as can never be overestimated. He planned the campaign against Denmark, and won great distinction in this field. But his genius as a strategist was displayed in its greatest brilliancy in the war with Austria in 1866. It is said that not only was he in constant possession of information about every movement of the army, but that he was never at a loss one single moment how to counteract all his adversaries' operations, and turn them to his own advantage. His character is as firm as a rock, and, when once engaged in the planning of a military movement, nothing can detain him from carrying it out, as long as he feels morally convinced that he is in the right, and that there is a chance of success. In spite of his seventy years he is still robust, and capable of taking an active part in the operations of the field.

HERWARTH VON BITTENFELD.

General HERWARTH VON BITTENFELD is considered one of the bravest, most skilful, and talented commanding officers in the Prussian army. He is older than MOLTKE, having been born September 4, 1796. He entered the army at the age of fifteen, fought at the battle of Leipsic, and took part in the invasion of France by the Allies in 1814, where he served with distinction in several engagements and at the siege of Paris. During the second campaign in Schleswig-Holstein, in 1864, he achieved a brilliant victory over the Danish army, and virtually brought the war to a close by taking possession of one of the most important positions of the enemy, the Island of Alsen, and by almost annihilating the troops who were ordered to defend the place. The war of 1866 again called him into active service. He was assigned to the command of the Elbe army, and gave many proofs of his superior talents as a military leader. He took part in the battle of Sadowa, and expects to see active service in the field during the present war.

THE STORY OF A SHIPWRECK.

CHAPTER IX.

A Volcanic Crater.—Fog on the Mountain.—An Excursion down the Bay.—An Ambuscade.

On one occasion when the winter was drawing toward a close, so that the days began decidedly to lengthen, and something like warmth was imparted by the rays of the sun, Mr. Raynal and Aleck set out to ascend a mountain at some distance in the interior, in the rear of the cabin. They attained the summit without any difficulty, and though they found it intensely cold, they were somewhat repaid for their labor by the grandeur and sublimity of the view. All around them were the peaks and summits of bare and rugged mountains, and beyond, in every direction as far as the eye could reach, the open sea. They scanned the horizon most carefully all around, but no sail was to be seen.

Their attention was attracted by a singular peak at a moderate distance from them, which presented what seemed to be the opening of a dark and deep cavern. They determined to visit this peak, and did so, following the crest of a lofty ridge which extended to it from the mountain on which they were standing. What they had supposed to be a cavern assumed the appearance, when they reached it, of a portion of the crater of an extinct volcano, one of the sides of which had fallen in, leaving another portion in the form of a vast overhanging precipice. The rock of which this precipice was formed seemed to them volcanic, and they observed, moreover, what appeared to be a current of ancient lava, which they could trace with the eye for some distance down the mountain-side.

On their return they went back as they came, along the crest of the ridge, to the mountain which they had first ascended, but by the time that they had reached it they were brought into a state of great perplexity and danger by a dense fog which had arisen, and which now enveloped the mountain, and rendered it impossible for them to move. They could scarcely see the ground under their feet, and besides the difficulty of finding their way back to the cabin, the attempt to grope, almost blindfold as it were, among the rocks and chasms and precipices which formed the mountain-side, would have been certain destruction.

So they were obliged to sit down upon the rocks on the summit of the mountain for more than an hour, trying to keep each other warm, and waiting for the fog to clear away. Fortunately for them, at the end of that time a breeze sprung up, which seemed to break up the fog into clouds and drive it away. The men soon warmed themselves by going briskly down the mountain-side, and so returned safely home.

A few days after this the men set off to make an excursion down the bay in their boat. They went on for several miles, and at length turned into one of the branches of the bay, and after exploring its sinuosities for some time they came to a beach where they landed, and after drawing up the boat began to ramble about, each one by himself, to search for seals.

Mr. Raynal, having become somewhat separated from the rest, observed at a distance, on the margin of a wood, something red which attracted his attention. On going to the spot he found some bushes entirely covered with a kind of red berry, which, of course, had grown the season before, and had remained upon the bushes during the winter. Mr. Raynal ate some of the berries, and says that he found them delicious. The intense craving which he elsewhere states the men had all along felt for some kind of vegetable food probably made him very easy to be pleased.

After eating a few of the berries, and finding what a treasure he had discovered, he set off in haste to call his companions. As soon, however, as he came in sight of the boat and the shore, his course was arrested by seeing Captain Musgrave crouched in ambuscade behind the boat, watching and aiming at a seal that was swimming in the water, at a short distance from the shore.

It seems that while Mr. Raynal was away the other men had seen this seal coming, and had concealed themselves where they could watch his motions unobserved, in hopes that he would come to the land so that they might reach him and kill him with their clubs. He came at length to the beach where the boat was lying, and began examining it, apparently with great curiosity. He clambered up by the gunwales so as to look into it, went first on one side, and then on the other, and finally concluding, as it seemed, that there must be some lurking danger connected with an object so novel and strange in form, he plunged into the water and swam away.

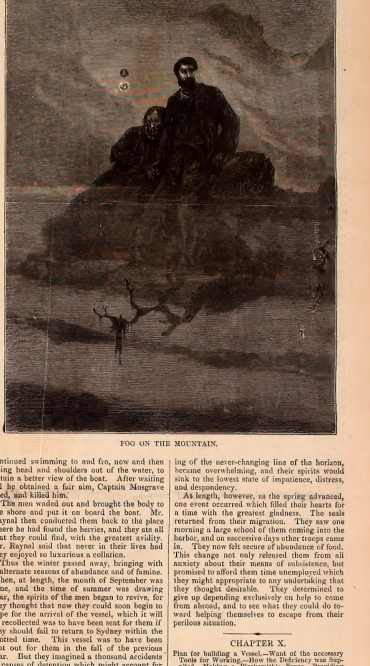
The men were afraid that they had lost him, but he did not go far. After swimming a little way he stopped and turned to examine the boat again, from what he probably considered a safe distance. Captain Musgrave crept down upon his hands and knees over the rocks and sand to the boat, cautiously took out Mr. Raynal's gun, and was just making ready to fire at him when Mr. Raynal came near enough to see what was going on.

Mr. Raynal stopped and concealed himself so as not to alarm the seal. The seal, on his part, continued swimming to and fro, now and then rising head and shoulders out of the water, to obtain a better view of the boat. After waiting till he obtained a fair aim, Captain Musgrave fired, and killed him.

The men waded out and brought the body to the shore and put it on board the boat. Mr. Raynal then conducted them back to the place where he had found the berries, and they ate all that they could find, with the greatest avidity. Mr. Raynal said never in their lives had they enjoyed so luxurious a collation.

Thus the winter passed away, bringing with it alternate seasons of abundance and of famine. When, at length, the month of September was gone, and the time of summer was drawing near, the spirits of the men began to revive, for they thought that now they could soon begin to hope for the arrival of the vessel, which it will be recollected was to have been sent for them if they should fail to return to Sydney within the allotted time. This vessel was to have been sent out for them in the fall of the previous year. But they imagined a thousand accidents or causes of detention which might account for the delay, and so endeavored to quiet their anxieties. But sometimes, on the other hand, their suspense and solicitude, and their weary watching of the never-changing line of the horizon, became overwhelming, and their spirits would sink to the lowest state of impatience, distress, and despondency.

At length, however, as the spring advanced, one event occurred which filled their hearts for a time with the greatest gladness. The seals returned from their migration. They saw one morning a large school of them coming into the harbor, and on successive days other troops came in. They now felt secure of abundance of food. This change not only relieved them from all anxiety about their means of subsistence, but promised to afford them time unemployed which they might appropriate to any undertaking that they thought desirable. They determined to give up depending exclusively on help to come from abroad, and to see what they could do toward helping themselves to escape from their perilous situation.



FOG ON THE MOUNTAIN.

CHAPTER X.

Plan for building a Vessel.—Want of the necessary Tools for Working.—How the Deficiency was Supplied.—Making a Blacksmith's Forge.—Providing Charcoal.

It will be remembered that it was in the spring of 1863—that is, in what was spring in the southern hemisphere—that our shipwrecked party sailed from Sydney, and that she was wrecked in a bay in the Auckland Islands early in January—that is, nearly at midsummer. An arrangement had been made with the owners at Sydney that, if the vessel did not return before the fall had fully set in, another vessel was to be sent in search of the party. But the fall and winter, and part of the second summer, had passed away, and the shipwrecked men saw no signs of any one coming to rescue them. They built a cabin, and had established themselves in it in a somewhat regular and systematic manner. They had set up a signal-pole on a cliff to call attention to them in case any vessel should pass that way. But months and months were passed idly, and were in the midst of lonely and unfrequented seas, and no vessel came near. At last, six months had passed away, the hope of being rescued by the intervention of others gradually faded away from the minds of the men; and they had begun to revolve more seriously than ever the question whether they could not do something to rescue themselves. He finally proposed to the men that they should undertake what seemed to them, when he proposed it, the herculean task of building a vessel large and strong enough to take them to New Zealand, which lay six or seven hundred miles to the northward of them, and was the nearest inhabited land.

Mr. Reynal conceived of this idea in darkness, a day which, he says, was one of joy and gladness throughout the whole world, but to them was sad and sorrowful indeed, since it only reminded them how fast the summer was passing away and no one coming to their aid. He proposed the plan to his comrades, and they all with common accord condemned it as utterly impracticable and hopeless.

Instead of attempting to argue the case with them he determined to convince them by example, by facts, which he said were more effectual in influencing men than all the reasonings in the world. And in the argument, in which he was any argument, was altogether on their side. For how could they expect to be able to build a vessel large enough and strong enough to make such a voyage over those stormy seas without tools, without materials, and without any provision in any of them of any special mechanical skill? Mr. Reynal, however, undertook to begin himself alone, in hopes that the others might be convinced, by seeing how much he could himself accomplish in the preliminary work, that the case was not as hopeless as they were inclined to suppose.

In reflecting upon the steps to be taken, Mr. Reynal considered that the first thing to be done would be to make the necessary tools. All the tools which had been saved from the wreck were an axe, which was now nearly worn out by use, a hammer, and a gimlet. He thought that he might obtain iron from the wreck, and perhaps more articles made of iron, which he might work over so as to make the tools that he would require—tools which, though clumsy, they would be very rude in construction, might possibly answer his purpose. But to make these tools some kind of forge was necessary, and so a forge an anvil, bellows, and a supply of charcoal were required. The principal difficulty seemed to be the construction of the bellows. He thought that one of the "pigs" of iron, of which the ballast of the vessel was principally composed, would serve for an anvil. So Mr. Reynal determined to begin with the bellows, in hopes that, if he should succeed in making them, the men would be encouraged to join him in his undertaking.

He accordingly went, at low tide, out to the wreck of the Grafton, and there contrived to rip off from the bottom of the vessel a number of sheets of copper, carefully preserving the nails. He also procured some boards, though they were not wide enough for the purpose. He, however, contrived to put several of them together, side by side, joining them by cleats, and securing the cleats to the boards by wooden pegs, as he had no nails to spare for that purpose. Of course he had no means of fitting these boards together very closely, to make the top and bottom of the bellows, and so he called the joints with a kind of oakum, which he prepared from the raveliugs of ropes, and by this means made them tolerably air-tight.

He required three of these composite boards, for the bellows's bellows, in order that it may give a continuous blast, must have two compartments, and these require a central board, fixed, and two others, one above and one below, movable, with valves in the middle and lower one. When the boards were made they fitted one of them to a proper form—that is, shaped them nearly to a wedge—to suit the curve of their rear compartment could pass through it. He then joined the three boards together at the place which the pipe had been fixed, with hinges made of his seal-skin leather. Thus the frame—or, as he called it, the skeleton—of his bellows was finished. He next covered the sides with this sealskin leather, which he first cut into the proper form, and then nailed securely all around the edges of the three boards. He had previously made the necessary valves in the middle and lower boards.

The work of constructing the bellows occupied a full week. When it was finished Mr. Reynal showed it to his companions. He tried it in their presence, and showed them that it would give a full and continuous current of air, entirely sufficient for the purpose intended. The men were astonished at his success, as indeed Mr. Reynal himself was. They considered the bellows a master piece of mechanical art, and all their doubts and fears about the possibility of building a vessel were dispelled. They were ready to go to work immediately, under Mr. Reynal's direction, and see what could be done.

Mr. Reynal had once formed a system of organization for the regular and methodical prosecution of the work. It was now adopted, and Harry should take charge of procuring food, by hunting seals, and also of the cooking and all the interior work of the cabin, while their the other three, being released from all participation in the duties of the household, should devote themselves exclusively to the work of building the vessel.

The first thing was to provide a supply of charcoal. This work Alcek undertook; and a very heavy undertaking it was. He was obliged to procure from the vicinity of wood from the neighborhood forests, equal in amount to one or two cords. This he made into a charcoal pile, and covered it carefully with turf. He then set the pile on fire in the usual way, and continued burning coal into a hole left for the purpose in the centre of the pile. But the most difficult and laborious part of his duty was the watching of the heap while it was burning. The turf covering would be affected by the heat, and would open cracks through which the burning wood within would continually burn into flame. These flames it was necessary to extinguish immediately by closing the opening with more turf, so that poor Alcek had no rest day nor night. Sometimes he was awakened several times in a night to suppress the flames, which, if they had not been arrested, would have consumed the store of wood which he had collected with so much labor into ashes instead of coal. As they required an unremitting attention, and as they were lowering, their ship-building operations were going on, Alcek was subject to continual fatigue, and labor and almost sleepless vigilance for many long weeks, but his resolution and his patience never failed.

SAVED BY THE SEA.

By JUSTIN M'CARTHY.

A SORT sandy beach, with a back-ground of clayey cliffs. Above them a road to the top, and, leading, when you had climbed them, like duck's webbed-foot-walk, to right and left the country of flat fields and hedgerows and trees; a caserne, and lines of ramparts and fortifications; a tall column in the distance, surmounted by a magnificent figure; on the beach, bathing-boxes and machines, and every professional and amateur bather, whose sex is only indicated by negations such as the lack of positive beard; on the beach, too, groups of passages, and groups of idle boatmen burrying in and out of the water; on the water, a few fishing-boats and a few pleasure ones or two; on the cliff, soldiers in blue coats and white gaiters; to the right, if you look from the water, a port, a pier, and a town. Such is the ruins of an old fort; and over all, a bright, blue, cloudless sky, in the light of which every object looks sharp as if cut in card-board: these are the chief components of the scene which serves as a stage for the story I am about to tell. Perhaps needs to be told that I have been describing a watering-place on one of the coasts of France. Well, you will find it, to a great extent, the paradise of rowdyism, British and American, of the passage and protecting altar of the fraudulent bankrupt, the Alsatia of the broken-down swindler, and the refuge of ruined reputation. The resting-spot to which discomfited blackguardism falls back for a fresh spring. Here are the cheap lodgings just outside the town and the hotels and lodging-houses and the établissement and the news-rooms, you will come upon a life so utterly false, so utterly unscribing as the life to be found five miles inland from the villas of Brighton, Trouville, or the Villebiests or St. Goar—is to that which you meet at the steamboat stations.

There came to this French town some years ago, fate-impelled, a young American gentleman and his sister. They were orphans; they had some fortune—not much, but enough to live quietly and travel on—and one of the two, the boy, was in weekly want. They went about Europe a good deal in search of health for her, and that did not find it. They came, at last, to this particular town, and there, by what must have been a singular chance, its fresh, sharp sea-breeze, and its especial attraction, seemed to do good to the invalid and revive her, although most of the physicians had pronounced her case past such a locality. She took, in fact, a liking to the place: and so her brother hired lodgings for her and themselves in the house under the cliffs. They lounged along the beach in the sunny days; they had their little entertainments; the girl, to whom no medicine in the world could do any good, was happy, or as happy as she might be, with a consumption to lay siege there. The place could not give her life, but it gave her some little brightness during the closing days of her life, and a happy delusion under which she believed in her own possible restoration to health and to her native land. When she died—which came to pass rather suddenly, and almost without pain—the physicians were surprised that she had lived so long, and attributed the fact in great measure to the liking she had taken for the place, and the influence of the sea-beach and its scenery gave her. Therefore her brother felt gratitude toward the spot which she had loved, and which had cheered her fading days; and he lingered there, vacant of purpose, but bound to the place, after her remains had been laid in the Protestant church-yard.

The young American girl had not made many friends, and, of course, had not mixed at all in the queer French society, English and American chiefly, which gained for the town its odd reputation. Two especial friends of her own sex she had, and, of course, being her friends, they had the friendship of her brother as well. One of these friends would have been, in the general opinion of society on the beach, little credit on the American lady. The wives and sisters and daughters of the shady and seedy of the bankrupt refugees in the town would doubtless have steered clear of knowledge any friendly relations with such a person. For it was a fisher-girl—a poor, simple fisher-girl—who carried a basket on her head, and commonly tramped the beach with skirts, or a skirt—I doubt if she had more than one—so much above the knee-pocket, and no stockings or sandbots or any covering whatever for the well-developed, firm, symmetrical legs, which she ran over to fetch or scrub the waves to drench and any one with an eye for form to admire all day long. The other friend of our American sister was a young French lady about her own age, Lucille Desterre by name, who lived with her father in an oddly shaped, rambling white house, with fantastic gables and green jalousies and a weather-cock, which stood in a field right over the cliffs, and sometimes flashed in the sunlight like a meteor across the eyes of passengers on the deck of the Anglais steamers miles away.

The American girl had made the acquaintance of both of these on the beach, and the acquaintance had ripened into warm and sincere friendship. Both the free ways of unmarried women in her own country, she talked to the bareleged fisher-lass as frankly as to the young French lady, and her brother were frequent visitors at the chateau on the heights, and her death, which occurred during a serious illness, found the fisher-girl into passionate prayer before the shrine of the Virgin, Star of the Sea, whereof to confess him, all hedizzee, with glaring blue and gold, looks out everlastingly across the waters.

The point of all this introduction is that Frank Churchill, the young American, grew to be deeply in love with Lucille Desterre, and unconsciously taught her to love him. He began to have thoughts of settling down in the French town with Lucille, and grew of his sister and the home of his love. M. Desterre, the father, quite approved of the hero's plans, love projects and all, and our hero had no one else to consult on the matter. Every thing ought to have gone perfectly smooth, and would doubtless have done so, but that two emperors intervened. The Emperor Napoleon, the ill-fated young man who was called for a short time Emperor of Mexico struck a heavy blow at the peace of our hero. The Emperor Nicholas was an old soldier, and a devoted Bonspartist, and he went in with Napoleon the Third to oppose the projects of the Mexican intervention, which Churchill, as a true American and advocate of the Monroe Doctrine, felt bound to oppose and condemn. So they debated and then disputed, and at last Churchill's conscience would have a quarrel, but declared, with all possible solemnity, that his daughter should never, never have his consent to marry one of a family so obviously an enemy of Napoleon, and, by necessary consequence, a foe to France, and an obstructer of her high privy Imperial interests.

By this time, too, the American civil war had unrolled its scroll of horrors. Churchill grew ashamed of himself for vegetating on a sunny foreign sea-beach, while his friends at home were in the front of their country. We be a favored and happy lover, were he a bridegroom of twelve hours' date, he felt that he must now the less have gone to take a post in the Federal army; and now that clouds looked so black at his horizon, he could see nothing more for him to do than to go to the war and fight and die in a good cause. So he told Lucille felt the parting, she saw only too clearly that it was inevitable. Time, she hoped, would change her father's determination. Time—ever in France—sets daughters at last free to choose husbands for themselves, independently of their fathers' will; and, meanwhile, it was not hard to persuade a spirited French girl, child of an old soldier and patriot, that her lover owed a duty to his country more immediate than even the fealty which he owed to his love. "I could wait," she said, "and, indeed, loved I not honor more, we noble words which Lucille Desterre could have appreciated better than a hundred better than most girls. The late civil war has taught most American girls to feel and value the spirit of honor and patriotism.

I have already said that at the extreme left of the picture presented to one who looked out on the water on the scene I have described stands an old ruined fort. It is built on a low-lying cliff, and immediately which straggles into the sea. The changes which such a shore is constantly undergoing by the action of the waves, and attrition of this poor rain as to subject it, twice a day, to a sea-bath, rising nearly to its battlements, on the ground on which it stood has been steadily sinking for generations; and now the sea has encroached so much that a little more has been meant to guard the harbor and dominear over the sea, stands far down below the level of the cliffs and the table-lands of fields and roads; and, indeed, the rising tide sometimes menaces to submerge it altogether. One can easily climb its ruined stairs, mount to the grass-grown floor at the top, and there watch the waters swell and break and then sink within a few feet of the spot whereon you stand, and you seem almost as isolated from the land as if you out on a lonely rock in mid-ocean. Indeed, a very pleasant, pigeon-cold, romantic sort of sensation may be enjoyed by mounting to the top of this ruin, and the tide yet about five, and there, seated safely, watching the waves rise and rise till they surge and splash almost to your very feet, and you look abroad over a waste of sea which seems every moment as if it would swallow up your resting-place and yourself—until, at last, the waters begin to recede, and you see your way to land again.
